"THE LADY DANCES" by MARGE STANLEY

SYNOPSIS

In search of adventure, Mark Talbot sails on the S.S. "Orient" for Honolulu. On board, he meets beautiful Vanya Prokovna, professional dancer. Vanya ignores Mark, but he cannot forget her. In Honolulu, on a round of the night clubs, he searches for her in vain. Next morning, while standing on a wharf, he watches a boat steaming by and is stunned to see Vanya on deck. He learns the vessel belongs to Pearly Shene and is undoubtedly heading south for Tonga in "The Friendly Islands." Anxious to get away from Honolulu, Mark books passage on the "Colin" sailing west Mark cannot resist inquiring about Vanya's destination. He learns that "The Friendly Isles" were once cannibal islands now inhabited with the scum of the South Seas . . . a disreputable place for any girl. All night Mark is haunted by Vanya's image. Despite his resolve to forget Vanya, Mark finally arrives in Tonga. He feels that if he can find Vanya and learn more about her, he will be disappointed and the obsession will vanish. Vanya is not at Tonga so Mark heads for Tongatabu where Pearly Shene lives. Mark is content and strangely happy.

CHAPTER X

An hour passed and another. Nuku had long dropped out of sight, they were rounding the south tip of the island A long straight stretch of beach appeared beyond the point; at its far extremity, a low reef jutted straight out into the sea. Beyond the reef Mark could just descry the masts and halyards of a ship riding at anchor.

The native directly ahead of Mark turned to him with a grin.

"Shene's Cove," he said, with a wave of his hand at the coral spit.

Instantly Mark's lethargy departed. He sat erect, and found himself fuming with impatience. The motion of the prau, which a moment before had seemed so pleasantly swift, now appeared to be no more than a snail-like crawl. He urged the natives on

"Faster!" he said, then, relapsing into the trade English of the islands. "Plenty quick!"

Nevertheless, the sun was low before them when they turned to the point of the reef. Mark glanced instantly at the anchored ship; it was indeed a schooner The name, faded by sun and rain and salt water was still legible—Porpoise!

Shene's Cove could hardly be termed a town, or even a village. Three or four native huts, a planter's dwelling a hundred yards down shore, and in the very center of the bend of the beach, a long, dirty-white two-storied wooden building whose swinging sign bore in large red letters, "Pearly Shene's Diver's Helmet."

Mark gazed from the sign to the deck of the schooner—that same deck on which he had watched Vanya standing as she sailed out of far away Honolulu Bay. The picture rece again to his mind. Had she smiled, or was it another trick of that untrustworthy imagination of his?

The prau grounded with a rasp of sand. The natives leaped out, drawing the craft higher on the beach, and Mark stepped out on the shore of Tongatabu.

A white man, unshaven, barefooted, in incredibly dirty white trousers, stood indifferently watching the natives discharging Mark's luggage on the beach. Mark looked him over critically; no, he decided, this couldn't be Pearly Shene—undoubtedly a beach-comber, one of the derelicts of the islands, a man ruined by the tropics and tradeum.

A native ran down from the door of the Diver's Helmet and appropriated Mark's bags. His erstwhile paddlers stretched themselves on the warm sand and fell to chattering among themselves. Mark followed the boy toward the decrepit building that served, apparently, as saloon, dance-hall, hotel, and doubtless other purposes.

He climbed the several steps to the door with a curious agitation stirring in him. What the devil was the matter with him, anyway?

"Don't make too much of a fool of yourself, Mark Talbot," he grunted, "if that advice isn't a bit late!"

As he entered the door, two girls looked up from a conversation at one of the tables. Neither was the object of his quest; they were typical of girls he had seen and known in ports all over the island world. Behind the bar stood an unbelievably fat Chinaman; the flesh of his cheeks completely covered a neck that must itself have been immense. Mark stopped at the bar, and the other stared at him with a serene smile that for all its actual expression might have been carven on his face, like a Buddha.

"Got a room — alone?" asked Mark, reflecting that even should his inquiries prove fruitless, it was already too late to go back to Nuku.

"Can do," said the massive individual, with a billowing of flesh.

Mark signed to the boy to remove his bags to the chamber. He turned back to the bar, and ordered a "whisky-and."

"How's business?" he queried, by way of opening the conversation.

"No business. No boats in. All dive until wet time."

"There's a boat in the cove," said Mark.

"B'long here. Native clew. No business."

"Is Mr. Shene in?" asked Mark.

"Not here."

"Where is he?"

"Nuku. Not here tonight."

"Did you ever hear of a girl named Vanya Prokovna? Did she ever dance here?"

"Not here."

"Do you mean you don't know her, or that she's gone?"

"Not here."

"Do you know her, though?" persisted Mark.

The Chinaman grinned blandly.

"Not here," he said. "One shilling."

"What?"

"Drink one shilling."

Mark gave it up, paid for his drink, and walked outside. The sun was grazing the horizon; in its reddening light he saw the beachcomber still lounging at the water's edge. He walked over to him.

The derelict looked up at his approach, and smiled. Something about the smile affected Mark, he felt a liking for the fellow.

"Cooler, for a change," he said.

The beachcomber nodded.

"The nights on Tongatabu often are."

Mark was startled by the man's voice; the tones were those of a cultured Englishman.

"English?" he queried.

"Right. You're American."

"Mark Talbot," volunteered Mark, "of Spring Brook, Connecticut, U. S. A."

"I'm Loring—Percy Loring," said the wreck. "Of the Abbeycroft Lorings—in the words of one of your famous Americans, 'Believe it or not!' The smile had lost its humorous quirk, and taken on a tinge of bitterness.

Mark sensed the other's self-directed sneer, and detected in himself a tinge of sympathy.

"On the beach?" he asked.

Loring nodded.

"Good and on!"

"Drink or women?"

"Neither. The War."

The statement struck Mark like a blow. The War! The same disruptive catastrophe that had made it impossible for Mark himself to suffer the dullness of civilization. Save for the grace of God and the accidental possession of a sufficient income, there, he reflected, stood Mark Talbot! The discovery seemed to create an added sympathy between him and this unshaven, emaciated wreck beside him.

"The War!" he echoed thoughtfully. "That's curious. I think I can sympathize. You see, in a way, i had what I suppose is a similar experience. Perhaps not as extreme, but similar. That's more or less the reason I'm here too."

He offered Loring a cigarette, which the other accepted avidly.

"Mind telling me?"

"I've told it before for a drink," said Loring. "But not right now—not to you. You see," he continued, "you're the first—the first gentleman I've spoken to in three years."

"Right!" said Mark. He stared speculatively over the bay, where darkness had fallen with tropical suddenness. He was thinking of the queer character at his side, and for the moment his quest was forgotten. The sheen of starlight on the water reminded him. He turned again to Loring.

"Did you ever know a girl, a dancer, named Vanya Prokovna?"

A smile broke over the beachcomber's erstwhile serious face.

"Is that information worth a drink to you?" he asked.

"It is."

"Come along, then." The beachcomber started toward the Diver's Helmet, but Mark stood unmoved. "My word's good," he remarked curtly.

"You're right. Sorry," apologized Loring. "I've forgotten how to deal with gentlemen."

He came closer to Mark.

"She's here," he said.

"Here!" exclaimed Mark.

He was thoroughly agitated by Percy Loring's statement. A rush of indistinguishable emotions surged through him; he could not identify his feelings. He didn't know whether he was delighted, disappointed, relieved, or angered by the beachcomber's news of Vanya's presence. Had Vanya herself appeared before him, he wouldn't have known whether to ignore her, kiss her, or choke her.

"Here?" he repeated stupidly.

"Not literally here," said Loring. "She's not in Shene's Cove at the moment. I mean she works here, dances at Pearly's place there."

"Where is she now?"

"Couldn't say," the beachcomber shrugged. "Maybe in Taulanga. Maybe back country. No ships in, you see, and therefore no business, and no need for entertainment."

"Or maybe visiting a planter," said Mark viciously.

"Maybe. But not likely."

"Why not?"

"Planters don't patronize Pearly Shene's, for one reason. They're a bit too toffy; they go to the Residency dances at Taulanga, and if they want other amusements, they go to Suva. And besides—" He paused.

"Besides what?"

"Well, she might be a lady, mightn't she?"

"Yeah?" said Mark cynically. "She's a dancer in a dive, isn't she?"

He wanted badly to hear Loring deny his insinuation, but the other's answer gave him no satisfaction.

"I suppose that's true, and you might add—Pearly Shene's dive. I don't know. I never tried—for a reason. In England one takes it for granted that a girl's a lady until proved otherwise; here one takes the opposite view, and it's practically a hundred per cent correct. But say! How about that drink?"

Mark acceded, and they entered the oil-lamp illumination of the Diver's Helmet. The carven smile on the Chinese bartender's fat face disappeared at the sight of Loring.

"Quite all right, Hong. The drink's on Mr. Talbot!"

Mark turned toward the bar, but the unkempt Loring indicated a table.

"Like gentlemen!" he said, and a trace of bitterness edged his voice.

"Anyway," he continued in a perfectly audible tone, "I like to see that fat swine Hong waiting on me. It's a small recompense for the times he's turned me down or kicked me out."

Mark looked at the corpulent Chinaman who was impassively bearing their drinks on a tray.

"Understand English?" he murmured.

"Every word!" said Loring, as Hong deposited the glasses and retired to the bar.
