Honest Man Rises Early

Cleveland —(UP)—After he discovered he had received a dollar too much from a bank teller who cashed his WPA pay check, William Lurie, at 5:30 A. M., took the money to police headquarters. When the bank opened, a patrolman returned the money personally to the bank.

America came to the General Motors building today they stated that newspaper accounts set forth their position as to a conference.

"They were handed the statement which follows by W. S. Knudsen, executive vice president of General Motors. There was no discussion.

"The statement:

"'In answer to statement by Mr. Homer Martin, as published today, we wish to state as follows:

"'Workers in the parts department of Cadillac were notified to report Monday in accordance with representations made to Messrs. Martin, Brophy and Mortimer, and agreed to by Mr. Mortimer over the telephone Saturday.

"'The same arrangements covered offices in Cleveland and Norwood.'"

Picket Plant

Anderson, Ind., Jan. 18.—(U.P.)—Strikers who ended their "sit down" at the Guide Lamp company Saturday under the Lansing truce picketed the plant today.

Charges of Homer Martin, United Automobile Workers president, that special police had torn down pickets' shacks were denied by Hugh Thompson, Anderson strike leader.

Thompson said strikers themselves tore down the shacks and planned to erect them later today on public property or rented property near the plant.

Police Chief Joseph Carney said there was no trouble and that his department had not been asked to intervene.

Can You Think Of The One You Want To Quote?

Sir Francis Bacon said: "The genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered in its proverbs."

Most people are familiar with these pithy sayings that have been drawn from the experience and from the literature of all the nations. But often we are at a loss for the exact wording.

Our Service Bureau at Washington has a new Booklet in which have been arranged in alphabetical order all of the famous proverbs of the world. You will find it an invaluable reference source when looking up a saying that you want to quote.

"PLATONIC" by JAMES ASWELL

SYNOPSIS

Merle Bigbee, rising young illustrator, is very satisfied with himself and the world as he and Sonia Farman are on their way to the Ritz in a taxi. Merle came from Richmond, Virginia, a year ago for two reasons: ambition to become a successful artist and determination not to drift into marriage with Mary Lou Prentiss, his childhood sweetheart. He liked Mary Lou well enough but the quiet, easy life of the south would have stifled him. Merle is flattered that the sophisticated Sonia, a successful artist five years his senior, considers him her contemporary.

CHAPTER II

"You've got talent, boy." She gave him a friendly pat on the knee. "There's none of the grueling battle you read about for young men with the goods. I tell you, Merle, the level of ability in this city is so low that anyone with even mediocre gifts is likely to be hailed and fêted."

From Sonia's lips there were answers, sure, adequate, for all the heavy-hearted problems of the world.

"Don't," she added softly, "go spoil it all now by falling in love. Not yet, anyway."

Merle thought swiftly back over his contacts with Sonia. He had never tried to kiss her. He had never even held her hand.

"Sonia," he told her with the thrill of discovery, "that's all bunk about a Platonic friendship being impossible between a man and a woman. Look at us."

The long oval of her face glowed in the shadow, and he could feel upon him the focus of those small black intelligent eyes.

"Of course. You know, you and I are really a lot alike, Merle. People have told me I have a man's mind. And that is why we are able to be real friends. We react to the same things in the same way. Sophisticated people never need to take advantage of every dark spot to grab each other."

He had a guilty twinge at that, remembering the way he had felt about Mary-Lou. But he had been terribly young. He recalled, too, that once returning with Sonia from the Belmont track he had thought the moonlight made it obligatory to put his arm around her. She had kept right on talking, as if she hadn't noticed. There was a shell, an immense reserve, around her.

"After all," Merle said, a little giddy with the new slant he was getting on life and love, "my work is the most important thing in the world to me. As yours is to you. Mutual respect and companionship—a spirit of pulling together—are pretty fine things. You haven't any idea what you've meant to me, Sonia, just in making me realize that."

"Exactly." She worked her splendid supple fingers together, as if to give emphasis to what she was saying. "I had my inning with the sort of crazy young love you read about. It almost wrecked me. But I believe intelligent people everywhere, in this day and age, are coming to see that real love goes deeper. It has to be managed, nurtured, preserved."

She leaned back, looking up at the ceiling of the cab.

"You knew, didn't you, Merle, that I'd been married once?"

"No." He had, as a matter of fact, heard rumors about an early marriage to a no-good husband, from which Sonia had escaped via Reno.

"I think if I ever marry again I'll be sensible about it. We'll have separate establishments. I'm going to avoid the day-by-day familiarity that takes the edge off things. He's going to have his friends and I'm going to have mine. And I like to see a man always at his best, too, just as I want him to see me. No lathered chins or curl papers! Not next time."

They were approaching the huge square of masonry which enjoyed its breathless swank in anonymity. Those who needed a sign to tell them this was the Ritz-Carlton Hotel didn't belong inside.

"I am going to fire my butler. I'm afraid he's in love with me."

Merle paid the fare and walked past the doorman in a glow. He was thinking what an altogether admirable person Sonia was. Wise, too; how very much wiser than he!

* * *

It was not yet two o'clock when Sonia's stony-faced butler took Merle's things. He glanced twice at the servant because he thought he detected animosity in the tilt of the blond faultlessly groomed young head behind the pale-blue Teutonic eyes. Inwardly he smiled. It was like Sonia to have a butler just a little haughtier than even stage butlers came. With Sonia he always got the sense of circumventing the humdrum, of avoiding the mean and usual thing. She had that sort of flair.

Her great high studio room was rich with yellow light. She stopped before a console mirror to apply a dab of lipstick and straighten her hair. Then she went in and sank upon a deep divan, drawing one leg up under her.

"Merle," she said, pouring from a decanter that was arranged with ice and ginger ale on a tea table ready for them, "I don't usually ask gentlemen in at this time of night. But, after all, New Year's! Did you get the look from Wilmer? There's something very funny about that." She motioned confidentially with her head for him to move closer. He did.

"When I tell you this you'll die. I'm going to have to fire my butler. I'm afraid he's in love with me!"

Merle blinked in appropriate astonishment.

"Actually, I didn't realize it until a couple of days ago. My maid, even, has caught on. Wilmer follows me around with his eyes like a devoted spaniel—and she thinks it's scandalous. It is an impossible situation."

Grinning, Merle said, "I don't blame Wilmer. How could you expect him to do otherwise, with you such a radiant person?"

"You're sweet," Sonia said. She ladled ice cubes into the amber tumblers. "Wilmer's not an ordinary butler. During the war he was a German aviator—an ace. He speaks three or four languages perfectly and he says he was a flight commander or something."

"I noticed the military bearing," Merle said. "It'll be a pity to fire him, but I guess you'll have to, as you say. Still, I think it's perfectly natural he should fall for you."

Sonia leaned her head back and half closed her eyes. "I don't know what I'd do without you to buck up my faith in myself."

"I shouldn't think you'd need any bucking. I'm the one that needs that."

"You silly boy. You have more talent than I have, and besides that you have a good business head. I dont know anything about managing my affairs. Nothing a-tall."
