NEW CONGRESS PLAN PROPOSED

Committee May Propose Party 'Policy' Groups.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 (U. P.).—The special committee to reorganize congress may recommend establishment of official Democratic and Republican "policy committees" in both the house and senate, it has been learned.

"These committees would decide what matters before congress were to be considered as party issues," a committee source said.

"They would tell members just what their parties thought about some of the controversial problems that come up. Then, if a man wished to vote contrary to his party's wishes, it would be a matter of public record."

At present, Democrats and Republicans have "steering committees" in both houses. The spokesman pointed out, however, that these groups were unofficial, and did not have authority to tell senators and representatives just what the official "party line" would be on any issue.

'Streamline' Purpose

The joint congressional committee was organized last year to "streamline" the legislative machinery of the house and senate. It has concluded its public hearings and a subcommittee is now preparing a report.

The spokesman said the recommendations would be submitted to the full committee shortly. Although the report in all probability will contain a "policy committee" plank, he said, details of how it should function—its size, method of procedure and so forth—will have to be worked out by the full committee.

The report will also urge both the house and senate to cut by one-half the number of its legislative committees.

This proposal is certain to arouse strong criticism, especially from chairmen and high ranking members of committees that would be abolished or subordinated under the program.

Six-Year Proposal

"In order to alleviate some of this opposition," the committee source said, "the subcommittee may recommend that no congressman or senator hold a committee chairmanship for more than six years."

"This six-year limitation," he said "would give all high-ranking committee members a chance to be chairman some time or other."

"Men who lost their chairmanships through the consolidation of committees," he added, "would have a chance to head the larger, stronger, more influential consolidated committee within a comparatively short time."

He emphasized that the proposed policy committees were not intended "to put congressmen on the spot."

"They will merely give his constituents a chance to see how he went along with the party," he said. "In some cases, they may prefer him to vote the way he did on that issue. In others, the congressman will be able to show by the record just how consistently he supported his party—in case some primary opponent picks out some isolated instance as typical of the law-makers's party loyalty."
