Taxation of Bonds.

Government bonds are declared to be exempt from State, county, and municipal taxation, but they are not declared to be exempt from taxation by the general government.

The proposal to subject them to a federal tax is denounced as an invasion of the power to destroy, the right of the government to tax involves the right to tax the bonds out of existence.

Suppose all this to be true. Is a government bond more sacred than a man's home? The right to drive a widow and her children from the house in which they live, by taxation, is asserted, and yet we are told that property in a five twenty bond is so holy that the hand of the tax gatherer must not be laid upon it.

The supposition is, that taxation of all kinds of property must be regulated by due regard for justice and common sense. These place a restriction upon the right to destroy by taxation. It is not true, as a general proposition, that the right to tax involves the right to destroy. It gives merely the privilege of exacting from citizens, or people, such sums of money, apportioned according to the value of their property, as are required for the support of political systems which properly, in all things, perform the offices and duties of government. This is what the right to tax gives, and all it gives. The power to destroy, and the right to destroy, are two very different things.

Government bonds are property, just as bonds and mortgages on real estate are property. The holders of each class of indebtedness are protected by the government, and should be made to bear equally, according to the proportion of their wealth, the cost of protection. The rule for taxation given above will prevent the government from exacting from the bondholders more than they ought to pay.

A Bold Swindler—His Adventures in Australia, America, India, China, and Europe. A Millionaire and a Pauper—A Wonderful History.

The following sketch of the career of a distinguished swindler is translated from the Evening Journal from the Berlin Zeitung, Aug. 14. It will be read with special interest by Californians, as this city and State were one of the theatres of the exploits of Edelmunn.

About the year 1859, he was employed in a tobacco store in this city, the largest one here at that time, and which was kept by a man named Frank. He was suspected of theft, and Detectives Lees and Ellis turned their attention to him. He was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment in the county jail. Shortly after his release from this establishment, he proceeded on his travels.

Some time during the war between Prussia and Austria, in the summer of 1866, there appeared at the Berlin exchange a man calling himself Edelmunn, who, apparently reveling in all the riches of an eastern nabob, succeeded in creating a profound sensation, notwithstanding the startling events of history at that time agitating the mind of all Europe.

Edelmunn had deposited large sums in English and East India banks, as he proposed to prove by check-books, letters, and dispatches; he wore a high order, conferred by the Emperor Maximilian, of Mexico, and boasted of a great number of the most eminent acquaintances. Merely for his amusement, he bought the great baronial estate Lyck, near Koenigsberg, in East Prussia, and spent large sums on its improvement, but resided mostly in Berlin.

Of course it could not be difficult for such a man to find recognition in the best commercial circles. The first banking houses of the metropolis were open to him, and he transacted eminent business on exchange. His household was furnished and carried on with princely magnificence. At the time when the famine in East Prussia enlisted the sympathies of the whole country, Edelmunn was as good as his name (Edelmunn—synonym with "noble man"). Besides large sums of ready money, he contributed to a fair, held for the benefit of the sufferers, a costly shawl, a present to him of the queen of Siam.

Down to the spring of 1868, Edelmunn continued here to enact this splendid role, and then suddenly disappeared. Where he came, whether he had gone, nobody knew. It was reported from Koenigsberg that he had sold his estate of Lyck, and started on extensive travels. By-and-by the modern Croesus was forgotten, till at once there came to us a piece of news from Frankfort-on-the-Main, which may interest some of our commercial circles, and is likely to cause a flutter among those who had closer business connections with Edelmunn. He, the seeming money king, whose name a whole army of brokers and others did not utter but with the profound respect, whose friendship was courted by merchant princes and embroiled Rothschilds, is nothing else but a dangerous adventurer and swindler!

lish banks, his decorations and aristocratic acquaintances. Strange to say, though our Croesus was hard up for cash, nevertheless, and in order to raise funds, he stooped to ask the head steward of the hotel for successive loans up to 700 florins. With that his role at Frankfort was played out, for a few days afterward he was arrested and exported as a swindler.

Edelmunn's adventures life furnishes a most interesting picture of the career of a swindler. However, it is to be regretted that his exposure remains incomplete, thus far, for his principal exploits appear to have taken place in Australia, America and Asia. At 18 years of age he left his native place, Wilkowitzken, and went to Australia, where he worked for some years in the mines. Here he also got married and at the same time changed his original name of Edelmunn to Edelmann. Somewhat later, he asserts, in the capacity of engineer, he built a railroad to Ballarat. Believe this who may of a man who, though he succeeded in deceiving the highest circles of society, is, oddly enough, unable to write. It is proven, however, that in 1858 he failed in Melbourne, and from this time dates his career as a swindler and adventurer. In California, in South America, in Panama, he reappears in the most different characters; now as a poor Jew, now as a rich man, and again as the great merchant. Forged contracts, drafts, and bills of exchange, found on his person after his arrest, give an idea of the extent of his swindling transactions at that time.

In 1862 we find him in the French army in Mexico, as a common soldier. He deserted to the liberals, did some what later important service as a spy, and rose at last to the position of a great army contractor. At about this time, he asserts, he received the order which decorated his breast while here.

In 1863 he went to China, and from thence to East India, where he remained to the end of 1865, and where he accumulated a fortune by great cotton contracts with the government. In Bombay, Edelmunn again failed. In order more effectually to conceal his purpose, he, the evening before he absconded, gave his friends a splendid banquet, at which all the luxuries of the Indies were displayed. While his guests were still reveling amidst the pleasures of the table, he disappeared with all the ready money and went to Europe. This last exploit undoubtedly furnished him the large sums which he commanded on his arrival at Berlin.

His mean, bad character is illustrated by the way he tried to free himself of his wife, whom, it seems, he became tired. She being in London, he wrote to her from Bombay, with directions to join him there, at the same time sending her money enough to pay her fare. When he knew her to be on the way he left Bombay, hoping that the poor, helpless woman, without means and friends, would perish in the strange land. And indeed, after her arrival there, she fell subject to the greatest distress, which was heightened by the circumstance that the reported death of her husband—a rumor started by himself for obvious reasons. At last the British consul took her case in hand and sent her back to London, where she is still living in needy circumstances.—San Francisco Bulletin.

Romance in Real Life—Trials and Tribulations of a Married Couple—A Husband Rescues His Divorced Wife from a House of Prostitution and Re-Marries Her.

When the call for soldiers to defend the country's flag was issued, there lived in a village in north-western Ohio a young man and wife, with three pretty, bright little children. The husband and wife were industrious, frugal and happy. They started at the foot of life's ladder, peculiarly, but at the time to which we refer they had accumulated some property, with fair prospects of securing a competency in a few years. The present, with them, seemed full of pleasure and the future bright with promise.

When the call was made for troops, and the country was thrown into a state of great excitement and fearful forebodings, this man, impressed with a sense of duty and fearing a prostration of business which would ruin him in his circumstances who remained at home, decided to enlist in the 21st Ohio. It required great effort for him to resolve upon his course, for, under any circumstances, the thought of leaving his wife and dear little ones produced painful emotions, but when was added to that thought the reflection that he was going into danger and might never return to meet his family, he almost felt persuaded not to be a soldier; but duty to his country and to his loved ones urged him forward, and the same love which made it painful for him to go still pressed him not to stay, and with tears in his eyes, and heart racked with contending emotions, he bade his little family good-bye, donned the blue, shouldered his musket, and went forth with the gallant boys of the 21st regiment to do battle for his country and his home.

For some months after the departure of the husband and father, the wife devoted herself, with accustomed faithfulness, to the duties and cares of home, living quietly in her humble abode, and feasting upon anticipated joys to be realized when the war was over and her husband again with her. But after many weary months of loneliness the tempter entered her home in his usual garb of friendship, and she fell. Her descent was indeed rapid, and she sank deep into the sloughs of vice. Soon her children were deserted, and she became the habitue of a den of infamy in our neighboring city of Detroit, an abandoned woman, given over to the worst forms of dissipation, and reveling in the lowest depths of human degradation.

Friends of the absent husband kindly cared for the deserted and homeless little ones, and the heartrending story of his wife's unfaithfulness was conveyed to him. Those who were with him when the painful intelligence was received described the scene as one which they never can efface from memory, crushed and heart broken was the unfortunate man.

Leave of absence was obtained, and he returned to what had once been his home—now a desolation—to provide for the proper care of his children and take steps for procuring a divorce from his faithless, fallen wife. He seemed impressed with the belief that he could have the courts annul the marriage contract, give him the custody of the children and that he would not only be free from her, but could forget her and perhaps secure another wife who would be more true, and whom he could love as fondly as he had the mother of his three little children.

Having completed arrangements for the children and procured a divorce from his wife, he returned to the army, and when his three years expired, re-enlisted as a veteran, and served faithfully to the close of the war. The wife, during all this time, continued to revel in dissipation, and became an inmate of one of the principal houses of prostitution in this city, seeming to have lost all love for her children and all expectation of ever recovering from her fallen condition.

At the close of the war the husband returned to his former home, but his friends observed that something was troubling him to a degree entirely beyond his control, and unfitted him for business of any kind. His appearance every day was that of a man who had just followed the object of his fondest affection to the tomb—lost, hopeless, and absorbed in his own thoughts, avoiding the society of all save that of his own children. None were able to solve the secret of his great trouble, for he communicated with no one upon the subject. Subsequent events, however, disclosed the fact that the base conduct of his wife and the divorce had failed to weaken his attachment for her. Indeed, his sympathies were aroused in her behalf, and his whole feelings became enlisted for her. He could not harbor the thought that the mother of his dear little children was an inmate of a den of infamy. Occasionally rumors would reach him, indicating that the truant wife was heartily disgusted with the life she was living, and that she still loved her former husband and longed for an opportunity to escape from the meshes of vice into which she had fallen, for the sake of her children.

Finally, love for the fallen one and for the little ones induced the wronged man to seek an interview with his former wife. While guilt and the wretchedness with which she associated advised her not to meet her injured husband, hope for the future urged to the interview, and the two met. The wife and mother was heartily repentant, the husband forgiving; the result was an agreement to get married again, take their children and seek a home where the wife's disgrace would not stain the lives of their loved ones, and they are to day living happily in one of the southern states, striving to forget the past, and struggling to become respectable and useful members of society, and to conceal from them all knowledge of the reason which induced them to seek a home among strangers.

In these days of divorces, inconstancy, and matrimonial infidelity, such examples of a higher, stronger, and purer affection are indeed refreshing. While perhaps but few persons could do as he has done, who will not say that his was the wiser course? By subduing everything like revengeful feeling and forgetting the great wrong committed by his wife, he has succeeded in rescuing her from a life and death of infamy, and sparing his children the bitter knowledge that their mother was an outcast. Will not the reader join us in the hope that he may never have occasion to regret the step which he has taken, and that a remembrance of her bad conduct may stimulate the reclaimed to become a better wife and mother than she was before her fall.—Tribune, Cincinnati.

THERE are probably no larger feet in the world than those to which the strong minded woman of this country are attached. While these roiling female lions were at Cincinnati last week, the size of the shoes they wear were ascertained by an enterprising reporter. Mrs. Phelps wears fourteenes, Miss Susan B. Anthony elevens, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton eights, and Mrs. Norton sevens; a pair of such feet would answer admirably for the pedestals of a couple of Bunkers Hill monuments. The high price of leather in this country is no longer a mystery. Each of these women ought to have a fan yard or two of her own.

STOKES says the "Republican party in Tennessee has gone to hell." Well, that beats B—H.

RADICAL papers fear that Harriet Beecher Stowe will next open on Dan Sickles, her success has been so great in the Byron matter.

A LADY in Missouri wants a divorce from two husbands. One of them lied about her, and the other ran away.
