Theodore Dripplemeyer of Jeffersonville is very low and his physicians say his condition is uncertain, that he might pass away at any time, or that he might again recover and be better for a while, though his ultimate recovery is practically impossible. He had been at the point of death a few months ago, but recovered. He recently became sick with the grip, which left his heart in a very bad condition.

There is a man out in Kansas City who suffers from a peculiar delusion. In the course of his work as a cleaner of chimneys he has killed many harmless birds, and he declares that their ghosts have come back to haunt him in his old age. He imagines that great flocks of snow-white birds swarm about him constantly, silently reproaching him for their destruction, and he thinks he hears them singing songs of mourning that they have learned in heaven. Boys who are cruel to birds ought to consider this man's example.
