Entered at the postoffice at Decatur, Indiana, as second-class matter.

A negro has been nominated for governor on the republican ticket in Arkansas. Do you wonder now why the south is democratic?

The decks should be cleared and everybody should be getting ready for the Big Northern Indiana Fair and Decatur's Old Home Coming Week. The week will be just what you make it and of course you're going to help. Remember it is less than two months away.

Seven hundred tickets were pledged by local people last year in order to secure a Chautauqua this year. These seven hundred season tickets will sell for only two dollars each and you are guaranteed to get your money's worth at a single performance. Speak for a ticket at once. The names of the signers for the tickets appear in today's issue of the Daily Democrat.

The democratic national convention opens a week from Monday at San Francisco and the people will be given a voice in the selection of a candidate and in the framing of a platform. The platform is not being delivered to the convention by a senator, nor will the nominee be selected under the roof of the Blackstone. It will be a convention of the people, by the people and for the people.

We received a supply of paper this morning sufficient to print the Daily Democrat on for the next four weeks. The price paid was four times more than a year ago. Besides this increased cost we had to truck it from the mill, the hauling costing nearly one hundred dollars. Added to this will be increased postage rates on second class matter which go into effect July 1st. These are just a few of the many reasons why we must increase the subscription price.

Speaking of vice-presidents, the Indianapolis Star pays the following tribute to Vice-president Thomas R. Marshall:

"The country has been particularly fortunate in the last seven years in having as vice-president a man of Mr. Marshall's judgment and sound views on the theory of government. It is hoped the democrats at San Francisco will not fail to maintain the present standard which the party has set for the second office in the land."

The correspondent of the New York World who had an interview with President Wilson the other day, states that the president talked with a twinkle in his eye and that his nine months' battle to regain his former good health has neither faunted the spirit nor impaired in the slightest degree, the splendid intellect of this great man. The correspondent also states that the president is all the more determined to fight for right and justice and to bring America to her sense of duty. Within the last two years the republican press of the country has tried to belittle President Wilson and block everything he has tried to do for mankind, but you can't fool all the people all the time and get away with it. The people are beginning to realize that in Woodrow Wilson, America has one of the greatest presidents in its history.

The New York Times in expressing their belief that Harding would be a "rubber stamp" president if elected gives the following reasons why the senatorial group put him across:

"Government of the senate, by the senate and for the senate." That motto and intent could hardly be written plainer upon the nomination of Harding. He was all along the secret and favorite choice of the senatorial hierarchy that finally proved to be in control of the Chicago convention. His preference for Harding was suspected from the first announcing of his candidacy; now it is established. Senator Penrose speaks boldly of the satisfactory "conferences" which he and his colleagues had with Harding. And when the time came, predicted by the frank-spoken Daugherty of Ohio, Senator Harding's manager, for a few men to meet in a room and decide whom the tired and deadlocked delegates should nominate for the presidency, nine out of ten of the conferees were senators. They agreed that the moment had come for them to take their courage in both hands and "put over" their original candidate. This they then proceeded to do in the most open way, giving the word of command to the delegates in the eyes of all.

"Why the clique of dominant republican senators should want Harding is no mystery. They like the man personally, as do all his associates. He is of infinite good nature, never harboring resentments and forever smiling even over the wall of parties. He would never attempt to force a policy of his own upon the senate. Indeed, it is doubtful if he would originate any distinct and forcible policy at all. His role would be genial co-operation with the senate. If a treaty was to be negotiated, he would let senators do the work and have their way. As for "senatorial courtesy," it would be delightfully enshrined in the White House. Patronage and appropriations would go smoothly under the sweetly reasonable dictation of the rulers of the senate.

"Whatever may be in the mind of Senator Harding himself in regard to all this, there is no doubt what the senate aspires to achieve. It wishes to make itself dominating in the government. In the republican platform written by and for senators, there is a demand that the president be stripped of certain alleged "autocratic powers." To whom are they to go? Naturally, to those who can make a better use of them—namely, the senators in control. For some time their appetite has been growing by what it has fed upon. They have killed the treaty. They have thwarted the president. Now they desire to make their supremacy permanent. To them it seems terrible that a president should venture to say, "The state, it is I," but if they can only change that to read, "It is we," they see no objection. So to change it is the scarcely concealed ambition of the senate. And it is because the republican senators are firmly convinced that Harding will oppose no obstacle to this grasping of power that they favored his nomination, did their best to bring it about and now openly rejoice in it."

ment plank. Democrats expected Cox would carry New York, New Jersey, probably California, Ohio and the democratic solid south, running on a light wine and beer plank.

The movement to Carter Glass, which McAdoo supporters started, apparently lost momentum shortly after it got under way. Glass said he lived in a section "which is relied upon to furnish the electoral votes but not the candidates." It was also pointed out that McAdoo's strength came from labor and that Glass could not hope to inherit this.

The McAdoo withdrawal coming on the heels of the Wilson interview brought a revival of reports that President Wilson would seek a third term. Two democratic senators denied that Wilson would seek a third term and declared that the reports were started to injure Wilson. Both these senators are close to the white house. Senator Glass is slated to head the resolutions committee on which administration backers believed they are assured a majority of the members.
