HORSES RUN AWAY; THREE FARMERS HURT

while the other two drove on. While the gate was being closed, the team that had been standing alone, started to run toward the barn. The horses ran into the plow on which Mr. Coyne was riding, threw him off the seat and ran over him, and then struck the plow on which the other son was riding, but he saw them coming and succeeded in getting out of their way. The plows were badly damaged. Mr. Coyne was unconscious when his sons reached his side. They carried him to the house and hurriedly called a physician, but Mr. Coyne had regained consciousness and was feeling considerably better when the physician arrived.

ELEVEN BODIES ARE RECOVERED FROM SUBMARINE

names of those who died within the ripped hull. Four physicians went down to the dry dock shortly after the first body was received to assist in removing those remaining.

J. H. Taylor, of the naval identification bureau in Washington was at the morgue. He said he hoped to identify the bodies by one or four methods:

1—By identification disks which some of the men may have been wearing. 2—By markings on such clothing as may not have been decomposed. 3—By fingerprints.

4—By dental work and other peculiarities in the teeth.

Taylor had not seen the first body when he spoke to newspapermen. The bodies were brought to the hospital morgue in casket baskets covered with white canvas. The features of all were unrecognizable and it was not apparent whether the men were officers or enlisted men as their uniforms were faded and torn.

Captain E. J. King, of the New London, Conn., submarine base, after looking over the vessel as it appeared above the water, led a group of navy officers in arguing that responsibility for the disaster belonged to the City of Rome. He based his claim on three reasons:

1—The hole shows that the submarine was struck on the port side which proved, according to Captain King, that the submarine had the right of way.

2—The angle at which the submarine was struck showed it was turning away and that the commander of the S-51 realized the situation. The Rome, he said, should have been able to realize it also and also turn away.

3—The lights of the S-51 normally were visible at an angle of 22 1/2 degrees and the angle at which the submarine was struck indicated the lights should have been seen by the watch of the City of Rome giving sufficient warning.

CADDIE BADLY HURT WHEN STRUCK BY BALL

La Porte, Ind., June 26.—Physicians were fighting yesterday to prevent lock jaw in the case of Edwin Dibble, 14 years old, a caddie who was struck in the left eye by a golf ball off the club of E. R. Shick. A hemorrhage within the eyeball occurred after the accident. The lad's nose also was broken. Whether the eye is lost can not be told until the blood clears away.
