companions passed up their first chance to land at 2 a. m. While the plane was flying over the Phoenix Island group. They had flown one degree and 36 minutes south and 42 minutes west of Canton Island, where Kingsford-Smith had indicated before leaving here Sunday that he might land if necessary.

The four men were attempting a non-stop trip from the Hawaiian Islands to Suva, in the Fiji Islands, 3,138 miles away. It was the second and most hazardous leg of their 7,778-mile journey to Brisbane.

Drawing the perils of the flight with Kingsford-Smith were Capt. Charles T. P. Uim, his fellow Australian and relief pilot, Lieut. Harry W. Lyon, American navigator, and radio operator James Warner.

The airmen were beset by rain squalls throughout the first half of the long voyage. Sometimes they dived into them headlong, but at other times the storms were so severe they were forced to climb rapidly above the black clouds.

During the night the left motor of the Southern Cross sputtered temperamental, but the fliers courageously minimized the danger. Their spirits high and their confidence undisturbed, they kept the nose of the huge three-motored craft pointed at the great constellation in the southern skies for which it was named.

The crew hoped to reach the Fiji Islands 33 hours after their departure at 5:20 a. m. (Honolulu time) yesterday from Barking Sands, Kauai. That would place their arrival at 2:20 p. m. Honolulu time or 4:50 p. m. P. C. T.

The route along the south seas is dotted with islands so small that they are marked by tiny dots on the largest of maps. Yet they gave hope to the fliers, for a landing might be made on one of them if the plane was forced down.

The trip to Suva was far more eventful than the non-stop flight last week from Oakland airport to Honolulu. The fliers had been in the air only a few hours when their messages began telling of difficulties. Fortunately, however, the troubles were only temporary.

For the first hour or five hundred miles everything went smoothly. Aided by a favorable wind, the Southern Cross was making fast time and the fliers were confident they would reach their goal.

At 10:15 a. m., five hours after they had left Barking Sands, they reported a short circuit in their battery charger. Apparently, however, the trouble related only to the radio apparatus, for three-quarters of an hour later another message said the ship was "still going strong."

Then the Southern Cross began running into rain squalls. It nosed its way through them successfully for an hour, the motors were never wavering. At the end of that time, radio operator Warner reported that the rain clouds had passed over and that the skies overhead were clearer.

"Just had a couple of sandwiches and some nice hot coffee," he said. That was at 12:30 p. m. He had messaged fifteen minutes previously that he and his companions were "still going good."

The plane was speeding over the sea at a rate of more than 100 miles an hour, 20 miles an hour faster than it had traveled during most of the California-Hawaii voyage, despite its heavier gasoline load. It was being pushed along by winds at its rear.

The rain returned at frequent intervals throughout the afternoon. It bothered the fliers somewhat, but no serious consequences were feared.

to conserve petrol," a message at 4:10 p. m. said. "Encountering many small rainstorms. Starboard motor began sputtering, but okay now. Altitude 600 feet, speed 72 knots."

The airmen had given their position ten minutes earlier as latitude 9 north, longitude 165.33 west. They had covered approximately 1,000 miles at that time and were sticking straight to their plotted course.
