Ex-Coal Miner Is An Oxford Scholar

Oxford, Eng., July 6.—(UP)—A former coal miner, married and the father of two children, is winning his way among the aristocratic sons of the rich at Oxford University.

Leaving the coal mines at Durham in 1923, Albert Dowell decided he wanted an education at Oxford. He entered the tutorial classes and in four years he had made a brilliant record in history and economics.

In succession he has recently won five scholarships. The first was for $250, the second for $775, the third for $400, and the fourth for $250. The fifth, and final one, grants him $1,125 a year to continue his studies.

An Indian Reservation

One hundred and five years ago, at Saint Marys, Ohio, was held one of the doggonest Indian pop wows, most ever heard of, outclassed perhaps only by the famous roundtable, wampum, killiknick discussion that William Penn, of blessed memory, had with the big chiefs.

This is the how of it: At that time President Monroe was a greatly annoyed president. The Indians had been given almost every thing that the United States government could give them except a home and a right to live, yet the warriors were getting peeved. Mr. Monroe realized that something had to be done or the mighty course of empire could not proceed majestically on its way.

Lewis Cass, Benjamin Parke and Jonathan Jennings were distinguished gentlemen who lived at that time and among their qualifications was a desire to give the white man a regular chance, save scalps and at the same time give the noble red men at least one tenth of one per cent. of what was left after the white men had all they wanted.

President Monroe appointed these able gentlemen United States commissioners. Told them to proceed to the source of the Kekionga river, blow their bugles and call into pop wow the painted savages of the great Miami tribe. This they proceeded to do. On the second day of October, 1818, the great meeting was held. Heap pipes were smoked. Heap talks was had. Heap had whiskey, perhaps was had. The meeting lasted until the sixth of that noble month, not, perhaps, on account of the amount of business but maybe because Chief Get-it-in-the-neck took that long to sober up. At any rate, on the sixth the game broke up and they—the commissioners and the chiefs—signed up a treaty by which the red boys got a slice of land that ran pretty well across the middle part of Indiana—the commissioners must have had some firewater, also—and in the shuffle there was dealt out to one Indian chief named Cho-a-pin-a-mois sixteen hundred acres of land along the Kekionga river. At that time the state of Indiana was but an infant of two years of age. Adams county had not been thought of yet and this land that what's-his-name got, was somewhere in Indiana, but nobody but the surveyor knew where it was and all he knew about it was what a little map said. Well to make a long story short, down at Corydon, which was Indiana's state capital—all one had to do to find that capital was to follow the blazes on the trees—they commenced to get straightened around and in course of time they marked off Adams county and then the township therein of Saint Marys and then that poor Indian discovered that his land was in Saint Marys township, being a part of sections fifteen sixteen, twenty-one and twenty-two.

The land was in fact granted to the children of what's-his-name, and they or someone named their dad Antoine Rivard, in honor of his father, who was a Frenchman by the name of Anthony Rivard, and it may be readily seen that Tony, the younger eugenically, was not a good mixture.

Antoine, however, hit the trail for his new home with his squaw and etcetera and tepees and dogs and a couple of jugs of firewater.

Now at that time there were plenty other Indians in that section of the country but as far as Mr. Monroe and his compatriots were concerned they had no more land than a rabbit. The only fellow that was a land owner anywhere was this half-breed Tony. He held undisputed sway as far as the government of the United States was concerned. No one of the white race bothered him or his, for many moons or to be exact until a whole year had elapsed when Henry Lowe built a cabin about five miles south of Tony's homestead. The next year Robert Douglas settled about 10 miles to the northwest and Rivard and his squaw and papooses and such warriors as boarded with him became discouraged over the increase of population.

Now the situation as we understand it was like this: Cho-a-pin-a-mois owned sixteen hundred acres of land. It was his and the White Father had so marked it off on the map. The map dignified the tract by calling it an "Indian Reservation." All and sundry were notified that then and thereafter it belonged to this Indian and his descendants. Theirs was a sacred right of honorable possession and no
