Rooms in White House

There is no official record of the number of rooms in the White House, as it depends entirely upon what one would call rooms. Practically all of the bedrooms have attached to them valet rooms. There are corridors used as sitting rooms and waiting rooms which could also be counted; then one might include the pantries and kitchens. On such a basis there are over 50 rooms in the White House.

Level and Rolling Land

The Geological survey states that when land is surveyed for division it is treated as a plane surface. Therefore, a quarter of a section of level land contains the same amount of land as a quarter of a section of rolling land, but there may be actually more surface or earth in the rolling section than in the level section.

Black Snow

Though sometimes discredited, it is an actual fact that black snow sometimes occurs. The color is produced by the action of innumerable fungi, known as the "Micrococci nivalis." It has also been reported from time to time that snow either red, blue, or green in color, has fallen in certain localities. This is caused by the action of such fungi. The black snow is comparatively rare.

Straw Headgear Old

Straw hats were first worn in the Eleventh century. They had mushroom brims and round tops trimmed with colored materials, with a finishing button that later developed into a peak.

Science has discovered that the gastric juices are influenced by the mental condition of the individual, that food whetted with tears is like poison to the body, that the quality of food is not so important as the mental condition of the eater.—American Magazine.

MacDONALD IN UNITED STATES FOR CONFERENCE

Hoover before dinner.

MacDonald's mission as understood here is one of friendship. It is designed to strengthen ties with Great Britain which have been strained since the break-up of the Geneva arms conference. It has been firmly denied that any Anglo-American alliance is contemplated, or any other agreement which might be inimical to France or other powers.

MacDonald is not certain that the cruiser program, which has been almost completely agreed upon, will be finally worked out during his visit. This mission, which is undertaken upon MacDonald's initiative, is regarded on this side as purely an informal friendly gesture. No specific problems are expected to be settled though many of them will be discussed.

The voyage of the British prime minister is destined to be a landmark in history because it comes at the moment when Britain is about to share the supremacy of the seas which she has jealously reserved for herself for centuries, crushing rivals such as Germany, who tried to challenge it.

MacDonald, always a foe of war, was determined to improve relations with America. He was also determined to stop the cruiser building race which both nations had drifted into.

following the failure. Through informal conversations with American Ambassador Dawes the program took shape, MacDonald cutting British cruiser demands from 70 as insisted upon at Geneva to 50. His trip to Washington was announced soon thereafter.

MacDonald calls it a "voyage of exploration" and hopeful it will "unnarrow the Atlantic." He has gambled his political life on the venture and is determined that if the trip results in more cordial relations with the United States, it will be worth the chance.

This is one of the momentous voyages of modern times. It signals the virtual agreement between the United States and Great Britain for complete naval equality by which England for the first time voluntarily shares the command of the seas with which she has held since the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Though MacDonald is a pacifist and refused a cabinet post during the World War because he opposed Britain's participation, full military honors were ordered by President Hoover. This is the only way in which this government could adequately give outward evidence of the importance it attached to the visit of MacDonald, the first time a British prime minister has come to the United States.

Averts Accident
New York, Oct. 4.—(U.P.)—A possible accident to Premier J. Ramsay MacDonald was averted by a narrow margin today just as the premier started to descend from the Berengaria into the city welcoming tug Macom at quarantine.

A gangplank was stretched from the high sides of the liner to the top deck of the Macom. The premier's party had passed over safely when the rope holding the Macom against the liner was parted by rubbing against a steel door in the Berengaria. The two vessels began to writ apart.

Seaman sprang forward and drew MacDonald back just as he was about to set foot on the gangplank. After a brief delay, the vessels were secured by a new rope and the premier boarded the Macom without incident.

The Ladies Aid Society of the Presbyterian church will hold a rummage sale November 14, 15, and 16. Place to be announced later. 235-63
