Another Contrast Formula—Two Fabrics—One Color

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—(U.P.)—The word "contrast," a byword in spring fashions, is so associated with colors in the popular understanding that more subtle methods of the contrast technique are often lost sight of, although they are distinctly growing in importance.

In his important collections of spring fashions, working two different fabrics together in the same shade is showing more representation. The contrast lies, of course, in the dissimilarity between the surfaces of a cloth and a silk, which such combination invariably develop.

The coat dress offers one of the most attractive examples of this fashion, since in tailored treatment the two-fabric idea works out particularly well, without having either a fussy or "made-over" look. The redingote, while not restricted to the use of contrast, glories in all its phases. The overdress can be cloth with the sheath below of matching silk; or the topdress can be developed of silk of one color and the underpart of printed silk.

When a dress is well made and combines two different fabrics of one color, the effect can be made to look "expensive."

There is a practical side to this duo-fabric mono-color idea, since it works out a way of making the cloth dress for spring more comfortable, for its parts of it are silk the dress is not so limited for wear in certain temperatures, and hence will have a wider appeal.

Besides the more conservative usages of fabric contrast already mentioned there are more unusual combinations like cloth and taffeta or faille; and cloth with cotton pique. The latest handling coming from the Paris openings, shows chiffon and flat crepe in one color, used together.
