Determination of Lady Wilkins to Dare Perils of Sub-Arctic Expeditions Recalls Other Examples of Women Who Preferred the Wilds to Pink Teas, Boudoirs and Civilization in General.

New York, Mar. 4.—(UP)—When Sir Hubert Wilkins, the noted Arctic explorer, made public his intention to attempt an approach to the North Pole by submarine, many opinions were voiced as to the wisdom or practical value of such an expedition. Beyond that, public interest in the affair was, to say the least lethargic. But since the wife of the intrepid explorer has declared her intention of making the hazardous trip with her husband, the world, which is first and foremost an incurable romanticist, has set up with a jolt and is beginning to take notice.

Lady Wilkins, who only recently made known her determination to be one of the crew of the sub-Arctic Nautilus, doesn't think that there is anything crazy or foolhardy about the proposed dive. She has no fear of that blind dive through frigid seas under an ice field twenty feet thick. The thousands of perils that lie in their path between Spitzbergen and Alaska are to her just details of a great adventure. Only one thing matters. She'll be with her man—and that's the true woman of it.

Lady Wilkins is just running true to form. History teems with examples of heroic women who have braved untold perils to be with the men they loved. One need only think back to pioneer days when the hardy men and women who made our west trekked out into what was then the great unknown. In those days the women fought side by side with the men, and many of them sent more than one world-bee scalp lifter to join his ancestors in the happy hunting grounds.

Our own generation contributes generously to the reputation that woman has won for fearlessness. Another lady who has no fear of old Davy Jones is Mrs. William Beebe, wife of the submarine scientist. Mrs. Beebe has accompanied her husband on many perilous expeditions in search of new data relating to marine flora and fauna.

To change the scene from ocean depths to tropical jungles. We have the saga of the Johnsons, whose adventures through regions of unmappped Africa make a more blood-stirring narrative than the wildest flight of fiction.

Martin Johnson, who shoots big game with a camera instead of a gun, has penetrated parts of the dark continent where a white man had never before set foot and filmed scenes that astound us stay-at-homes who must find our adventures in the pages of detective thrillers. In all of his hazardous expeditions Mr. Johnson was accompanied by his wife, who did her share of the dangerous work of recording the habits of wild animals with the camera. On one occasion, while taking pictures at night, the explosion of a flashlight enraged a lion and caused him to charge the daring woman. Was she scared? Well, maybe, but not scared enough to make her hand shake; for she fired when the charging beast was only fifteen feet from her and killed her lion with one shot.

Pink teas, boudoirs and civilization in general pale upon many woman who have that dash of adventure in their blood. Mrs. William Seabrook, wife of the author and traveller, is one such. Mrs. Seabrook has accompanied her husband in his strange wanderings in many lands, among Bedouins in Arabia, cannibals of unexplored West Africa and Voodoo workers of Haiti. She once averred that she felt much safer in the most savage-infested jungles than she did in some of our most civilized cities.
