BARRED FROM GOBI DESERT

day published their correspondence refusing to permit Andrews to proceed. It said, in part:

"Cooperation is impossible with mutual respect and appreciation. Your arrogant attitude alone is responsible. If cooperation is made so difficult."

Andrews, in an interview with the United Press, commented:
"I returned to China in April hoping to arrange for the completion of our expedition, which is desirable to science. The Chinese commissioners declined even to grant an interview, a discourtesy which remains unexplained."

Andrews has conducted several expeditions into the Gobi desert under the auspices of the American Museum of Natural History. He discovered the famous "Dinosaur Eggs" some years ago gained him international fame, and more recently his expedition discovered the "Peking Man" in the ancient rock formations of the Gobi, which he believes science will prove the cradle of civilization.

Old Forts, Like Custer, Must Face 'Last Stand'

Former Bulwarks of Strength for Pioneers of Far West Are Trampled Underfoot by March of Progress

Mrs. GEORGE A. CUSTER. CHIEF SITTING BULL.

Trampled underfoot by the inevitable march of progress, the old forts and military bases of the United States Army in the West are to be abandoned in the interest of economy—their days of usefulness over. Rich in historical lore, these old forts once stood as bulwarks of strength for bewildered pioneers, harassed and slaughtered by marauding Indians as they strove to carve a new empire in the West. One of the most tragic incidents connected with the old forts whose doom has been sounded was the massacre, one blistering day, in 1876, of a detachment of troops under General George A. Custer, and all his men were slain, after a gallant "Last Stand," by Sioux and Santee Indians led by Chief Sitting Bull. Mrs. Custer, widow of the general, now residing in New York, has voiced a protest that the old forts, so closely linked with the progress of the nation, are to fall before the very element which they helped preserve.

Washington.—(UP)—As in time immemorial, the inevitable march of civilization has trampled to death the very agencies which were born in another era to protect the progress so painstakingly made in pioneering the great Western plains and mountains of America.

Established to safeguard the white man's civilization of another day, now long past, old forts and military bases of the United States Army, grown ramshackle and tumbledown from years of practical disuse, are to be abandoned in the interest of economy.

No longer will once stout walls hear the snap and crackle of military orders, gone will be the soldiery uniformed in several generations of American Army styles and colors, the grass on the sweeping parade grounds will be free to grow high and unkempt without subjugation under the measured tread of marching legions. In short, naught but the ghosts of departed heroes of the Indian wars and tragedies of America's frontier ever pushed westward, will stalk where once the old fortresses formed a bulwark of strength to early settlers bewildered by a new land beset with bloodthirsty warriors.

Among those most poignantly hurt by the order to abandon the western outposts, milestones in the history of America, is a pleasant old lady, Mrs. George A. Custer, widow of the dashing general who was massacred with his men one terrible day at Little Big Horn, Montana.

"Custer's Last Stand" forms a trio of words known by every American. General Custer, Union officer during the Civil War, was sent into the West following Lee's surrender to supply military protection to pioneers trekking toward new and fertile lands. Indian war parties were continually harassing and attacking trains of covered wagons isolating small groups of settlers and slaughtering them and generally proving a menace to the progress of civilization.
