As Finland Cast Wet Ballots

Scenes like the above were the order of the day when the voters of Finland balloted to decide the fate of what is their equivalent of our Eighteenth Amendment. The nation-wide referendum resulted in an overwhelming vote being cast for the repeal of the prohibition law. The most remarkable feature of the referendum was the heavy vote cast by Finnish women, most of the credit for the abolition of the unwanted law being awarded to them as a consequence. Photo shows a peasant woman who journeyed a long way to register her protest against prohibition, marking her ballot at a Helsingfors polling booth.

CROWLEY PAYS WITH HIS LIFE

extreme penalty for the murder of Patrolman Frederick Hirsch, wantonly slain when he found Crowley and his sweetheart, Helen Walsh, parked in their automobile on Long Island. Police were seeking the youth for another crime.

The mother until the last day held aloof from her son—and even then she withheld her identity. Eight hours before the young gunman died her message arrived at Sing Sing prison—the only message he ever received from her.

It was in a brown package enclosing a rosary enfolded in a note on which were scrawled these words: "From your mother."

A few hours later Mrs. Crowley, the foster mother he had called "Mom," left him alone with the rosary. She wept as her two daughters, Mrs. Margaret Kennedy and Mrs. Alice McNally, walked with her through the dimly lighted, steel barred corridors out of the great prison doors.

An automobile whisked the family away in a pouring rain. Crowley called a guard, asked for a newspaper, wasn't interested, then called for Warden Lawes.

"Try to see me again," Crowley said as they clasped hands in parting.

"Don't know if I'll be able to," Lawes responded.

"You come back or I won't go," Crowley told him.

The warden sent some ice cream. Crowley shared it with Ruth Brown, negro woman sentenced to die later.

9:30 p. m.: Crowley told guards he would "make no fuss" when he went to the chair. Father John McCaffrey had advised him to pay the penalty without the bravado that had marked his life.

10 o'clock: Helen Walsh, the sweetheart who turned state's witness and whose testimony helped send Crowley to the chair, ended her vigil outside the prison gates. She had pleaded in vain for a "good-bye kiss."

Crowley would have none of her. "She wants to tell the story to a newspaper," he cried. The sweetheart who preceded her had given the tip that sent a hundred or more police to Crowley's last hiding place where he was captured with Miss Walsh and Rudolph Durringer later electrocuted for another crime.

11:00: The grim procession entered the execution room where the electric chair stood 10 paces from the silent, swining door. Beside Crowley were Chaplin McCaffrey and Chief Keeper T. C. Sheehy.

Crowley spurned proffered aid. He walked firmly toward the silent spectators. He reached the chair and of his own accord started to unbutton his white shirt.

He saw Sergeant Stephen Lyons, one of his guards. "Hello Sarge," he called cheerfully. "Hellow Crowley," the sergeant responded, almost inaudibly.

Then the killer known as "two gun," sat down in the chair. Guards adjusted the cap to his head. His smile faded. And he uttered a dramatic message to his mother.

A strap seemed to have loosened. The guards tightened it. Crowley's request.

11:01 p. m.: The current thrown on, just a few seconds later the group entered the room, though to spectators it seemed almost a lifetime. Father McCaffrey droned his prayer.
