Gotham Claims Loveliest Salesgirls London and Paris Beauties a Poor Second to Department Store Venues of New York. Beauty Behind the Counter an Aid to Business.

The recent claim by Londoners that the English capital has the most beautiful shopgirls in the world, was a big surprise to New York shoppers, who immediately registered a vigorous protest. Without appealing to the League of Nations, America has claimed possession of the pinnacle of pulchritude for the salesgirls of Gotham. And if there are any dissenters in the audience, a walk through a few of the metropolitan department stores will convince the most skeptical that there is good foundation for the claim. Above are four Venuses, discovered during a random ramble through one such emporium. Marion Sullivan, of the wistful, winning smiles is the presiding goddess over the notions counter in a Brooklyn store. In the very same emporium is Gertrude Aaronson, whose exotic Castilian beauty is a big asset to the cosmetic counter. Could London produce two to equal this pair of beauties in one store? Then there is Catherine Rice, the shining light of a Just one block further on, Ethel Kane, petite, chic Manhattan Store. She supplies a million dollars' and winsome, packs the customers into the shop in d worth of decorations to the millinery department. So sorrah, London! Your shopgirls may be the buds but Gotham's salesgirls are the berries.

New York. The war is on! No one keep you seat. The United States is not embroiled in any conflict of arms. The situation is not quite that serious. But London's claim to its having the most beautiful shopgirls in the world threatens to precipitate an international pulchritude crisis. The claim is vigorously disputed by gay Paris, the chic and vivacious midcities of which have long been the proud boast of La Belle France. If the French and English were permitted to fight the battle of the well-turned ankle, the sharply defined eyebrow, the nice ly-chiselled contours of the features and other prime factors that go to make up general loveliness, everything would be all right. But, in open defiance of the United States policy of isolation, New York shoppers have issued an ultimatum to France and England, challenging the claims of both and putting the Gotham salesgirl at the pinnacle of pulchritude. Although the challenge has put these United States in the precarious position of being enmeshed in the foreign entanglements against which we have often warned, it has served one useful purpose in making us use our eyes as we go on a "Sea America First" tour through the labyrinths of our giant department stores.

Hereofore the purchase of a tie or a pair of socks was a colorless, routine matter of necessity. But since the claim has been put forward that nearly every department store counter harbors a Venus—under a bushel, as it were—rather dry business of shopping has taken on a glamour akin to that of ones that visit to the "Follies." Henceforth, when a visit to a department store becomes necessary, mere man will go forth on his quest for socks and suspenders with the glorious prospect of being waited upon by a goddess with the dimples of a Janet Gaynor, the eyes of a Garbo, the tender mouth of a Loretta Young and, maybe, the legs of a Dietrich. No longer will he appear like a condemned soul marching the last mile through the little green door, as he renders into the doll department to purchase a talking baby for his niece. The anticipation of being catered to by a beautiful creature, the living embodiment of Helen of Troy, Cleopatra and Ninon de Lenclos all rolled into one, will give a new zip to his step, a brilliant gleam to his beauty-loving eye and a disastrous blow to his salesresistance. Too long the unusing heroinoid of the department store have been regarded as automatons, to fetch and carry. America has awakened to the fact that she has an unexplored mine of beauty in the army of sales girls that day after day engage in the erculean task of trying to please everybody and listen to the monotonous of the lordly shop walker informing them that the customer is always right. They have won a place in the international spotlight and the Marines will hardly be necessary to make good their claim to world supremacy in pulchritude. A trip through a few of the metropolitan department stores ought to convince the most skeptical that New York has it all over Paris and London when it comes to downright eye-pleasing femininity. Take Gertrude Aaronson, for example, whose exotic Castilian type of beauty is a magnet that drags customers into the Brooklyn store where she works. Could one ask for a better advertisement for the cosmetic counter, where she is in attendance? In the same store, is Marion Sullivan, whose smile speaks for itself. Catherine Rice is the shining light of a Manhattan store. She supplies a million dollars of decoration to the millinery department. Just a block further on, Ethel Kane, petite, chic and winsome, packs the customers in, in droves. Yes, it's worth international contemplations to have our eyes opened to what we've been missing.
