New Expedition May Seek Lost Explorer

Report by Jungle Trapper That He Had Met Colonel Fawcett in Amazon Wilderness Revives Hope for Explorer Missing Seven Years.

The report of Stephan Rattin, Swiss trapper, who recently returned to Sao Paulo, Brazil, after a journey through the wilds of the upper Amazon, that he had met a white man in the jungle who said he was a British Army colonel, has renewed hope in England that Colonel H. P. Fawcett is still alive. Although Rattin's story is not given much credence by Brazilian authorities, British officials think it worth investigating and a movement is on foot to send an expedition into the jungle to seek traces of the missing explorer and his companions. Since Fawcett, his son, Jack, and Raleigh Rhinel, an English youth, plunged into the jungle wilderness of Brazil to seek a lost civilization their fate has been veiled in mystery. Many search parties have penetrated the region where they were believed to have been lost in an effort to solve the riddle of their disappearance. Colonel G. M. Dyot, English explorer, led an expedition into the Amazon country and gave his opinion that Fawcett and his companions were either killed by Indians or had died of privations. However, there have been many reports that the lost colonel is still alive. Several jungle wanderers have claimed to have seen and spoken with him. One of the most notable was Luiz Lebur, former chief of police in the Brazilian town of Cuyaba. Lebur was positive in his identification of the colonel. However, scientists and explorers who know what conditions are in the wild country, are certain that Fawcett could not have survived for seven years in a region where death reaches out in many forms for the white man.

London, April.—Although Brazilian authorities do not place much credence in the latest story about Colonel H. P. Fawcett, the British explorer lost seven years ago in the jungles of Brazil, the report of Stephan Rattin, the Swiss trapper who said he had met a man claiming to be the lost colonel, had started a new movement here for the organization of an expedition to seek Fawcett and his two companions.

Rattin, who recently returned to Sao Paulo after an expedition to the wilds of the upper Amazon, reported to the British consul that he had spoken to a man in the great jungle who, though he refused to give his name, said he was a colonel in the British army. The trapper suggested that the mysterious man might have been made a captive by one of the Indian tribes on a tributary of the Amazon.
Since Colonel Fawcett, with his son, Jack, and Raleigh Rhinel, an English youth, plunged into the great jungle in search of a lost civilization seven years ago, their fate has become a mystery which has lured several exploring parties to search for them, incidentally or as their main objective.
The most extensive of these search expeditions was that of Colonel G. M. Dyot, who penetrated the region where the missing men were believed to have gone. Dyot gave as his opinion that Fawcett and his companions had been killed by hostile Indians or died of privations.

Notwithstanding Dyot's report, however, many persons have since claimed to have seen and talked with the lost explorer.
In 1926, Roger Courteville, a French engineer, reported in Lima that he had found a man whom he believed to be Colonel Fawcett living in the jungle with the Indians. A son of Fawcett's who questioned the Frenchman decided from the description that the man Courteville had seen might well be his father. Mrs. Fawcett, the colonel's wife, when informed of the report in London, was indignant at the suggestion that her husband had turned Indian, but was confident that he still lived, declaring that she had received telegraphic messages from him.
Two years later, Luiz Lebur, a former chief of police in the Brazilian town of Cuyaba, said he had talked with Colonel Fawcett while on a trip into the jungle.
However, among explorers and scientists, who know what conditions are in the wild region where Fawcett was lost, little hope is entertained that the Britisher is alive. Even, the point out, were he to overcome the hostile attitude of the savage tribes that inhabit the jungle along the banks of the culture, and E. W. Sehergens, Tell City.

Secretary Hurley plans to fly here tomorrow from Washington with Mrs. Hurley. They will be met at the Fort Harrison airport by a reception committee headed by Governor Leslie. After brief military ceremonies Mr. and Mrs. Hurley will be taken to the governor's mansion.
Six airplanes will fly to Dayton, O., to escort the war secretary to Indianapolis.
