"EMBERS OF LOVE"

SYNOPSIS
Lily Lou Lansing, pretty, young telephone operator, lives with her married sister in moderate circumstances. She is torn between desire for an operative career and love for a wealthy Ken Sargent. Following a party at Ken's home, Lily Lou realizes they are unsuited socially and decides to give him up. Ken overrules her objections and she accepts his proposal of marriage. A few days later they are married at Woodlake. They break the news, personally, to Lily Lou's parents and send a wire to Ken's folks. That night, both are uneasy as to the Sargents' reception of the news. Next day, they return home, Mrs. Sargent threatens to have the marriage annulled.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Ken's mother followed them to the door. "This is sheer nonsense, Kentfield," she said briskly. "I tell you your father has already taken steps. Your marriage is no marriage at all!"
"I won't leave Lily Lou!"
"I tell you the marriage will be annulled!"
"All right. In September I'll marry her again. In the meanwhile if you want to start a swell scandal about your own son, go to it! Go ahead! See if I care!"
"Kentfield, I'm ashamed of you. My dear boy—listen to me—"

They went down the stairs, Lily Lou red and humiliated, Ken, white and shaking with passion.
Ken started the motor, drove off. Lily Lou looked at his white, set face. "He was driving fast . . . but where? Where, in all the world, was there a place for him to go?"
Lily Lou tried to think, but her brain wouldn't work. She was just one blob of pain. Her head ached, her eyes, her very bones. She wished . . . no, no, she wouldn't wish it . . . but oh, to be back again—just herself, just Lily Lou Lansing.
Ken was driving. Just driving. Nowhere in particular. They were on a dusty, unused road, now, in the low hills, back of Piedmont. He stopped in the shade of an overhanging oak, drew out his cigarette case, reached for his lighter. But he didn't light the cigarette. He sat there, looking at it. "Well, that was sure a warm reception."

She couldn't find anything to say, so he cleared his throat, began again: "Mother's on her high horse, I can see that."
"Will you father—will he—"
"He'll do whatever my mother wants," Ken said bitterly. "He always has. Only way to keep peace, I guess. . . . So it's all up with us, Lily Lou."
He hung out his arms stiffly, jerked down his head. . . . She felt the convulsive heaving of his body . . . he was crying, his head in her lap.

Lily Lou didn't cry, but she felt sick and desolate. All alone, no one to turn to. . . . She stroked his hair with soft fingers. "Dear, don't mind too much."
And her heart was crying. . . . "This is the man I married. . . . who was going to take care of me. . . . My Ken, who could sweep the world before him . . . here, crying on my lap."
She stroked his hair, in silence. Presently the heaving ceased. He lay still, breathing brokenly, his head heavy on her knees.
When at last he lifted his face and met her gaze, his cheeks flushed, his eyes blurry, such a rush of tenderness as she had never felt before washed over Lily Lou, and she didn't care that he was weak, that he had cried, that he had quailed before his mother. . . . She only knew that she loved him and that she had not known that love could be like this—so weighted with pain—so binding. And the thought came to her, that even when Mrs. Sargent had their marriage annulled she would still be tied to Ken. . . . tied to him forever, by the hurt of her love, and the pain of her memories. . . .

"Will you stick, Lily Lou?"
"Will I . . . stick? . . . why Ken, you said it was all over—"

"I meant it was all over, trying to make up with the folks. But Lily Lou will you stick with me, even if mother has it annulled. . . . maybe she won't anyway, but Lily Lou, will you stick with me? Will you be married to a failure?"

She couldn't speak. The relief of hearing him say it. . . . She smiled, tremulously. "Ken—I ought to let you go—"

"Let me . . . you just try. . . . It's only that I thought of you. Suppose mother does have it annulled—it's just like her—"

"Well, suppose she does—" Lily Lou tried to think.

"Then we wouldn't be married—honey—it wouldn't be legal—"

Lily Lou gulped. She thought of her mother . . . her mother playing the wheezy organ in the church at home. . . . and Pop, always talking about taking a shot at somebody . . . he never would, of course, but he did have a gun . . . and over at the store, the men gossiping and Rufe Fletcher, who owned the store, slicing himself off a thin slice of cheese with the big knife, and nibbling on it as he talked. . . . Oh, she did so want to be married, really married! Oh, why wasn't Ken just a little older, so he'd be 21 . . .

"But we could be married again in September—" she told him. She wanted to hear him say it, to reassure herself—

"Oh, yes. Only it's sort of taking a chance for you. You know—if people start talking, and well . . . people do have kids, you know."

Lily Lou felt the hot blood mounting to her forehead. "It isn't likely," she said lightly. The same thought had occurred to her. She didn't want to consider it. . . . It wouldn't do. . . . Besides, just as many didn't as did . . . May and Raymond. . . .

"Well, what shall we do? Oh, Ken, it's been so funny. Right from the first we've been so sort of homeless. We had to keep away from my house, and yours, and here we are . . . and you haven't any job, and I haven't any money."

She began to laugh, a little hysterically, "and any minute we're likely to be arrested for not being properly married—"

"He whipped out a check book. 'No money? Look here—'"

She looked at the balance—almost a thousand dollars. "That isn't so hot, but listen. . . . I'll get on with Hoyt and Wickley, in the steamship end. . . . They are agents for a lot of lines, and I happen to know they need a man. When I heard of it I thought, 'Gee, if I could only get into that, away from the darned office and figures. . . . You know—ships! That's my line, ships.' Listen, Lily Lou I'll get that job, and make good, and then I'll get on as foreign agent somewhere—there are big concerns all over the world. Listen, Lily Lou, I'm all unemployed directed suspicion upon them, police said.

versity?"

The murdered policeman was Opie McCracken, 35. He was accompanying the theater men as they carried $740 to a bank. The two bandits robbed the theater men after killing McCracken and then fled with three companions waiting in an automobile.

Marriage Licenses Increase
Detroit, Mich.—(UP)—Prosperity still may be just around that corner, but the young people of Detroit apparently are tired of waiting for it to come out in the open. At least, marriage licenses issued in Detroit, the first three months of the year resembled the figures for the boom periods rather than a depression. The number issued in January, February and March ran about 500 a head of the number for the corresponding period last year.

OWING to the amount of work in the Surveyor's office, it is impossible for me to make a thorough canvass of the voters before the primary. I am taking this means of saying to those I did not see that I earnestly solicit their support and vote next Tuesday.

I have always worked for the best interests of the Democratic party. If I am nominated and elected I shall conduct the office of county surveyor as efficiently and economical as possible.

I am a married man, 36 years old and the father of two children. For 15 years I have paid taxes on real and personal property in Adams County.

Am thoroughly acquainted with the laws and work pertaining to the Surveyor's office and if nominated and elected, promise to work for the taxpayer's interest.

I am managing my own campaign and running solely on my own merits and in the event of my election can continue in office without political strings or promises to any group or ring and will give the same economical, unprejudiced and courteous service that I have in the past.
