Boston Men Flounder

Those who sit indoors in comfort in the cold New England winters may think two Boston men, James Joseph Walkworth and Joseph Masan, who back in 1844 went into business together and "agreed to risk their money in a scheme for installing a new heating device in business houses and residences" to this company belongs the early development of steam and hot water heating of buildings.

Arhagton Cemetery Mansion

The mansion in Arlington cemetery has been restored to the condition in which it was when a private residence. A great deal of the original furniture could not be secured, since it had come from Mount Vernon and had been returned, but period furniture has been used. It is a handsome example of a plantation home before the Civil war.

Early River Navigation

The first trip up the Ohio river by steamboat was made in May, 1815, by the Enterprise, of 75 tons. She traveled from New Orleans to Louisville in that year, the trip taking 25 days. The steamer Washington made the same trip in 1816 and inaugurated steamboat navigation in the Mississippi valley.

Etymologically the words "friend" and "bend" are antonyms. They come from Anglo-Saxon verbs meaning "to love" and "to hate," respectively, and are related to words of the same meaning in other Teutonic languages.

Doumer Triumphed Over Early Poverty

Man Who Became President of France Fatherless on Day He Was Born. Supported Mother and Educated Self. Lost Four Sons in World War.

RECENT PORTRAIT OF LATE PRES. PAUL DOUMER.

AT HIS INAUGURATION

The greatest battle Paul Doumer had to win during his climb to the Presidency of the French Republic was against poverty. Doumer's father died on the day his son was born, at the little village of Aurillac, in the province of Auvergne. The young man who was destined to rule his country spent his early life in a Montmartre slum, in direst poverty, supporting his mother and educating himself. At 22, he entered politics and was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, where he won a name for himself as a man of flashing brilliance. In 1895 he became Minister of Finance in the Cabinet of Leon Bourgeois and conceived the "global and progressive income tax," thus becoming the father of the income tax in France. His next job was as Governor of French Indo-China, which post he held from 1896 to 1902, when he returned to France and resumed his place in the Chamber of Deputies. In 1907 he was defeated for the Presidency by Armand Fallieres. Doumer visited the United States in 1907 as representative of France at the opening of Carnegie Institute at Pittsburgh, Pa. During the World War he was a member of the Superior Council on Military Aeronautics. Three of Doumer's sons died in battle for France and a fourth died of wounds after the Armistice. He served three terms as Minister of Finance between 1921 and 1926. His election to the Presidency in 1931 came as a surprise to the outside world, as the practically unknown Doumer was thought to have a slim chance of defeating the veteran Aristide Briand.

Paris, May 11.—Though the entire world was shocked by the assassination of President Paul Doumer of France, it is by the solid middleclass people of his native land that the death of the statesman is regarded as one of the greatest national tragedies since the martyrdom of Jean d'Arc. Doumer was idolized by the "petite bourgeoisie" and the "rentiers"—that thrifty, highly respectable major segment of France which is the economic backbone of the richest people on earth. He was that rarest of men, the people who rose to great heights and still remained a man of the people.

Though practically unknown he was called to the Presidency in 1917. Doumer had a long and distinguished career in French politics, and it was due to his hatred of anything approaching ostentation that he was not better known internationally. Born in Aurillac, a tiny village in the hilly province of Auvergne, the future President of France was from birth fated to fight an uphill battle, for his father died on the day he was born.

Brought up amidst the direst poverty in the slum district of Montmartre, in Paris, young Doumer spent his early life working to support his widowed mother and spending every spare moment in self-education. This devotion to study had its reward when Doumer received his degree from the University of Paris in 1877, before he was twenty. The same year he obtained a position as instructor of mathematics in the little town of Mende, at a salary of $360 a year. It is said that while he held that position, he used to walk 20 miles to a railroad station in order to go to Paris to see his fiancée.

Doumer's entrance to politics was through the medium of a small country newspaper which he edited. He worked so well at his job that following an election campaign he conducted all the candidates he backed were elected, and Doumer himself emerged from the melee Alderman and Assistant Mayor of Anizy-le-Cateau.

Three years later, at thirty-one, he was elected to the French Chamber of Deputies, where he slowly won a name for himself as a man who understood finance. From then on, his rise, though not spectacular or marked by any flashing brilliance, was sure, until in 1895 Doumer became Minister of Finance in the radical cabinet of Leon Bourgeois.

While in this position Doumer conceived the "global and progressive income tax," thus becoming the father of the income tax in France. Because he fought so energetically for its adoption the Bourgeois ministry was ousted, but Doumer's abilities had attained national recognition. Doumer's next job was as Governor of French Indo-China, which post he held from 1896 to 1902, when he returned to France and resumed his place in the Chamber of Deputies. In 1905 he was elected president of the Chamber, and in the following year was defeated for the Presidency of France by Armand Fallieres by a vote of 449 to 371.

Doumer visited the United States in 1907 as official representative of his government at the opening of the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh, Pa. The World War found Doumer a member of the Superior Council of Military Aeronautics and of the Technical Committee on Railways. Three of his sons died in battle for France and a fourth died of wounds soon after the Armistice.

Ocean Levels

The mean level of the Pacific Ocean is about eight feet higher than the mean level of the Atlantic. In the month of January the levels are the same throughout the year, but on account of the wind influence, the mean level of the Pacific ranges above the Atlantic. It is as much as four feet higher in October.
