Good Riddance!

"Burial" of the traditionally worn eadur, or cloak, and veil, was performed by 200 women at Telonia, Persia. A grave was dug and the cloaks were placed in it, under the epithet: "Here lies the cloak, the emblem of women's servitude. God's curse be upon it."

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

Lily Lou's chin quivered. She was suddenly homesick. She wanted to get away from this strange room, and this strange woman, and all the strange sights and sounds of the city. She wanted to bury her head on her mother's lap, and hide there, with her face against her mother's voluminous skirts, with the tangle of honeysuckle and passion vine shutting off the front porch and the old rocking chair, from the quiet street.

She didn't mind the thought of defeat, of coming back in disgrace, a failure. She didn't mind anything, but being here all alone with these people who had foreign ways of thought and speech. She wanted to be home again, where some one cared, and things were safe and unchanging.

She whisked a stray tear out of her eyes, faced the strange, kindly prima donna, determinedly. "You see—I can't tell them."

Madame Nahman reached soft, fat arms to her. "No, darling child, you can't tell them. And what do we care for them? Nothing! Those devils, men! Never mind. No man is worth crying over. But you must never trust one again. There, reach me my handkerchief. You see how I am? All heart—I wear myself out on other people's troubles, but I cannot help it, it is my curse—my temperament. See, I am crying more than you! Now we shall stop. I'll have more hot coffee, and then I shall be better. You too? No? Oh, yes, just a taste, from my cup . . . good?"

Lily Lou drank from the cup, set it down again with a steady hand. "That is right," Madame Nahman said briskly. "Courage. You have it, too. You will make a singer. My first thought was right. My first thoughts are always right. It is only my second thoughts. . . . One of your duties will be to keep me from listening to my second thoughts . . . you hear that?"

Lily Lou nodded. She did not trust herself to speak. She wanted to leave, to get away from here. Nahman glanced at the jeweled clock by her bedside. "Eleven! It is not possible! Now you must go. I have a friend coming. He must find me beautiful!"

She slipped out of bed, a billowing mountain of silk and lace, beamed tearfully upon her audience. "Tonight! We meet on the boat tonight. Now kiss me, and go!"

Lily Lou kissed her. She went out, and stood in the hall outside the door, for a long time. She thought, "I won't go. I can't. I'll go crazy or something!"

On the way home she turned it over in her mind, arriving at no conclusion.

Mrs. Manchester had a bon voyage basket, big as a young clothes-basket, ready on the table in the hall.

Lily Lou looked at it. Examined the jars of jam and conserve, the two new novels, the box of candy, through their transparent, shiny wrappers. Sniffed at the red roses and waxy lilies of the valley tied on the handle.

"Now, now! You're not homesick already, my dear? You flatter me, not wanting to leave me!" Mrs. Manchester gushed, patting her, playfully.

"Well, I am a little homesick. I—I sort of hate to go." "Of course you do. But think what a glorious time you will have with the famous Nita Nahman. Parties, receptions. All the famous people in Europe. Really, you don't know how fortunate you are!"

"Yes, I'm awfully fortunate," night, but promised to announce it just before she starts across the Atlantic. The flight across the Atlantic is about 1,900 miles.

The trip from Hasbrough Heights, N. J., to St. John was made in three hours 25 minutes, at a speed of about 189 miles an hour.

Miss Earhart's plane has a cruising radius of 3,200 miles, cruising speed of 140 miles an hour, top speed 189 miles, is equipped with three compasses, and carries 429 gallons of gasoline. The flier estimated that the trans-Atlantic journey would require 13 hours.

Miss Earhart emphasized that she would be guided by weather

She went into the room that had been hers and looked at the piled luggage.

Lily Lou said. She thought of Madame Nahman, and the parties and gaiety. It would be very wonderful . . . oh, if she could only go home instead. . . . "Was there any mail?" she asked nervously.

"I think so. SA-DIE! What did you do with Miss Lily Lou's mail?" They found it. Two letters, and a postcard. The postcard was a picture of the city hall in Oakland. It was from Raymond's father and said, "Best of luck in the big city. Kind regards from yours truly, R. W. Kittridge."

The air mail letter was from May and the other came from her mother. She opened her mother's letter first. It had a leaf of rose geranium enclosed, and a scrap of blue dotted swiss. "Your father is painting the kitchen white for me. It will take three coats, to cover the old paint. I aim to get one of those coal oil ranges before summer, though the wood range has such a good oven I don't know that I can give it up. The swiss is for the curtains."

Lily Lou read it through slowly. Then she read May's letter giving her a lot of news about home.

When she had finished reading it, Lily Lou stuck it in her purse with her mother's letter and her passport. She went into the room that had been hers and looked at her piled luggage. It was hard to tell whether everything had been done. Frances Bradford had moved in already. Her clothes were piled on Lily Lou's bed.

"Oh, I'll go," she thought, automatically pressing her throbbing head with her cold hands, hardly conscious that it was aching. "I'll go. I can't do anything else. And I hope the ship sinks."

The ship did not sink. It cut its way across the gray Atlantic, in the teeth of a gale that sent white spray high as the smokestacks, and shook the ship to its very timbers.

Madame Nahman stayed in the stateroom for two days, having all her meals sent up. She had Lily Lou's meals sent up too, but Lily Lou could not eat. As Nahman predicted, she was sick.

At first she worried that all this would annoy the prima donna, they sharing the same cabin.

But no, it amused her. "I don't want to seem cruel," she said sometimes, eyeing poor, greenish Lily Lou with ill concealed gusto, "but it's so funny. I haven't laughed like this for 10 years, not since—but this is not the time. Some day, perhaps I shall tell you, when the babe is safely in the arms of a Bonne. We shall have a nice French one, with streamers, and petticoats. I shall get you the most crocheted petticoated bonnet in all France. Wait! Then we shall laugh, you and I together, and laugh, and laugh—"

Nita Nahman did not wait. She laughed now. Loud and long. And at sight of her, with her longish hennaed hair flying and her bright blue eyes burning in her sallow, leathery face, there were times when Lily Lou was almost afraid of her. There was something hardly sane.

But she was so kind. Even when her familiarities, her easy discussions of things that Lily Lou had been brought up to think one didn't discuss, her direct, embarrassing questions were hardest to bear, you were conscious of her kindness, her genuine good will back of it . . . and what could you do?

Not that Madame Nahman spent much time in the cabin, after the second day out. It amused her to rig herself up in her most garish costumes, and sit for hours playing bridge at ten cents a point.

The sight of her turbaned head, wrapped in silver or green brocade, and her huge bulk swathed in trailing chiffon became almost as familiar as Maxine Rochon's shack of brown hair and spotted baby-blue bathrobe.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT

In memory of Catherine Adalaide Deininger, who died April 30, 1932.

The Angel of Death has entered our midst, and we are called to mourn the loss of a faithful friend and charter member.

We cherish her memory tenderly as a true friend and sister. We shall meet her again in a blessed reunion after life's work is over and greet her in the land, where our Heavenly Father has prepared a place of eternal rest for His faithful children, and there we will realize more fully that her model life is one deserving of our imitation.

Therefore, be it Resolved, That the heartfelt sympathy of the Catholic Ladies of Columbia, Saint Mary's Council No. 29, be extended to the family of our deceased Sister in these their sad days of bereavement.

Resolved, That the charter be draped in mourning for thirty days and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family and the Day's Press and a copy be spread upon the records of this council.
