"MURDER of the NIGHT CLUB LADY"
THE NEW THATCHER COLT DETECTIVE MYSTERY
BY ANTHONY ABBOT

COPYRIGHT, 1931, BY COVICI-FRIEDE, INC., DISTRIBUTED BY KING FEATURES SYNDICATE, INC.

SYNOPSIS

Lola Carewe, night club habitué, receives a death threat. New Year's Eve. Previously her dog and parrot were mysteriously killed. District Attorney Merle K. Dougherty suspects Lola of being the "brains" of the jewel thief ring that has baffled the police. Although her husband, Gaylord Gifford, died practically penniless, Lola lives in luxury. Police Commissioner Thatcher Colt places a guard in Lola's penthouse apartment, warning her that she must not be alone in a room at any time. Mrs. Carewe, Lola's mother; Chung the butler, Eunice the maid, and Vincent Rowland, an attorney, are present. In the living room, the Commissioner finds a bag belonging to Christine Quires, Lola's guest. It evidently had been used that night, yet Lola informs Colt that Christine is at the Lion's Paw, a roadside house, where Lola was to have joined her. Colt is surprised to find Mrs. Carewe's room in strange contrast to the surrounding wealth. Lola's own boudoir is a gaudy contradiction of the living room's elegance. Lola refuses to reveal the identity of the young man whose photograph adorns her dresser.

CHAPTER SEVEN
"MISS LOX, please go to Miss Carewe at once. Remain with her until her return."

Hearing this order the mother came hurriedly out of her room.

"Please don't mind my daughter," she pleaded. "All her life she has had her own way. Spoiled, no doubt. But good at heart. Why not let me go to her instead?"

"One of my people must guard her," Colt insisted. "But you may go with Miss Lox."

Mrs. Carewe shrugged her shoulders with a foreigner's disapproving resignation. She followed Dorothy Lox to the bedroom door where the girl operative knocked and, receiving no answer, opened the door. Mother and detective then entered the boudoir and were hidden from our view.

Colt stalked to the fireplace and struck a gong suspended from the mantel. Chung instantly responded.

"Who is Miss Carewe's physician?" he asked sharply.

"Doctor Hugh Baldwin, who occupies the seventh suite on the second floor of this twenty-three-story building," supplied Chung, placid and grave.

"Please telephone him and if he is ask him to come here at once. If not, let me know—we must get someone!"

Betraying no surprise, Chung turned on his flat heels and waddled from the room. But neither Dougherty nor Rowland were so self-controlled. At once both attorneys leaped from their chairs, confronting Colt and demanding to know why he had called a physician.

"Unless I have read her wrong, Lola Carewe is due for an attack of hysteria," predicted Colt.

Both the District Attorney and his elderly confrère looked relieved.

"Then it was not because you anticipated violence?" asked Rowland.

Colt lit a cigarette.

"I don't know what to anticipate," he confessed. "But of one thing I feel sure—I have accounted for every human being in this apartment—and no one else can get in without being discovered."

Here Colt sent me to the door to inform Lieutenant Fallon that Doctor Baldwin should be allowed to enter. When I returned, Dougherty and Rowland were lighting cigars.

"With all the safeguards that you have thrown about Lola now, Thatcher," protested the District Attorney, with a pop-eyed glance around him, "there can certainly be no more real danger—if there ever was any," he finished dourly.

Vincent Rowland nodded.

"If, after all that you have done,

Colt should accomplish for him. At Colt's question, he pushed the old skin higher and smiled like a satyr.

"There are plenty of men who have tried to lay their hearts at her feet, since Gifford's sudden death. She has refused them all. I don't believe any of her disappointed males would murder. Still jealousy."

"Might there not be other motives?" suggested Dougherty, studying a diamond ring on his own finger.

Vincent Rowland frowned and lowered his fingers from their vain employment.

"Perhaps! There is one curious circumstance which, maybe, I should not tell. When I first met her—"

Unexpectedly, the bedroom door opened and Lola Carewe appeared, wearing a peach-colored woolen bathrobe, with straight, black stripes. She was bright and smiling.

"Please don't be angry with me, Mr. Commissioner," she apologized. "That woman detective of yours is so charming—she laughed me out of my pout. I realize I have behaved very badly."

"Say no more about it," dismissed Colt.

"What time is it now?" she called gaily. "How long before the deadline?"
