Governor Roosevelt and Sons Enjoy Life in Small Boat On Ocean Cruise

"Well, he simply draws himself into a ball and forgets about it," John replied.

While I inspected the small ship, which set sail from Port Jefferson, L. I. Monday, Franklin smoothed out his father's bed.

"We have to keep things in shape you know," he said. "This is the skipper's bunk and it has to be just right."

Roosevelt smiled.

Rejoining the New York governor at the helm, we chatted for several minutes.

"This cruise has been swell," he said. "There is no finer sport in the world than cruising along this beautiful New England coast."

"You know," he declared, "there is one ironclad rule aboard this boat that I am enforcing—that all dishes must be washed and in their places before we start the morning journey."

Enthusiastic as a university freshman on vacation, Roosevelt pointed out to me the surrounding points of interest.

"Incidentally," he explained, "in a few hours we will pass a cabin called Gray Gables where former President Grover Cleveland used to visit.

"You know Mr. Cleveland was about the only president who really appreciated sailing and dabbled about the coast."

"And say," the governor said, "we have been eating well. James had been involved with Lola Carewe, as she called herself, and I knew that she was an evil influence in his life," said Mrs. Baldwin.

"I tried to get Hugh on the telephone," Mrs. Baldwin went on, "but Miss Simon explained that he had gone out."

Here Miss Simon interrupted: "The doctor went out shortly after I arrived this morning, Mr. Colt, and soon after he was gone Mrs. Baldwin telephoned. When he came back I told him that Mrs. Baldwin was on her way to the office. He looked at me without replying, then went into the private office, closing the door. I didn't know that he had locked it."

"And that is all you can tell me, Miss Simon?" asked Colt.

"That's all I know, sir," Colt turned to me.

"Get Marshall over here. He's working across the street in a door man's uniform."

As I hurried out, Colt was resuming his examination, getting the factual data about Doctor Baldwin. By the time I had returned with Detective Marshall in his ornamental uniform of blue and gold, Colt had a sheaf of notes beside him, which he turned over to me. While Marshall and I waited, he continued: "Under the circumstances, Mrs. Baldwin, it will be necessary to delay the plans for the funeral until the police have completed their investigation. I would suggest that you return home now. Have you relatives in the city?"

The stout little lady stood up and dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief, three inches square, the perfume of which filled the room.

"Only my children," she answered. "We have two boys and a girl. They will have to be told."

She extended a plump little hand. "You've tried to be very kind to me. Thank you, Mr. Colt."

"Mayn't I go home with her?" entreated Miss Simon, impulsively. But Mrs. Baldwin straightened her hat, insisting:

"No, thank you, my dear. I think I would rather be alone."

"MURDER of the NIGHT CLUB LADY"

THE NEW THATCHER COLT DETECTIVE MYSTERY

BY ANTHONY ABBOT

Copyright, 1931, by Corvici-Friede, Inc. Distributed by King Features Syndicate, Inc.

SYNOPSIS

Lola Carewe, "The Night Club Lady", and her guest, Christine Quires, are mysteriously murdered in the former's apartment. Scorpions were the instruments of death. The police suspect Guy Everett, the last person to see Christine alive. Lola had blackmailed Everett. He, however, claims that Christine discovered a plot to kill Lola and feared for her own life because of her knowledge. Police Commissioner Thatcher Colt learns that a young Paris bank clerk, named Basil Boucher, loved Lola. After robbing a bank to buy her a ruby, Basil disappeared. His parents sold medical laboratory specimens, Mrs. Carewe, Lola's mother, became hysterical at the mention of Basil, calling her daughter a beast and saying Lola never loved him. Edgar Quires, Christine's brother, left his Rochester home for New York following the receipt of a telegram the day of the murders. Christine was to have inherited wealth shortly. Suspicion also points to Dr. Hugh Baldwin when it is disclosed that he purchased scorpions. He had stated heart failure caused the deaths. Colt, calling to question Baldwin, finds him dead.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

THE moment we were alone Colt brought me to the body and put throat.

"There, Tony," he pointed out, "is the deadly kiss of the Durango." And there indeed it was, a tiny red vesicle, crimson over the jugular vein.

"And here," added Thatcher Colt, bending beside the sprawled figure, "is the messenger of death!"

He picked up the dead insect between his fingers—its long feelers waved as my expelled breath passed over them. In silence, Colt put the Mexican scorpion into an envelope, sealed and marked it and gave it into my keeping.

"Our work is cut out for us," continued the Commissioner, "but before I notify Flynn and the rest, I want to do some private sleuthing and ask a few questions without interruption. Has Mrs. Baldwin regained consciousness?"

I found the pudgy little widow sitting up on the edge of the easy-chair in the front office, staring out blankly, while Miss Simon talked to her soothingly and rubbed her head with some aromatic fluid.

As always, in such investigations, my instincts revolted against the work we now had to do. This poor woman should be surrounded with sympathy and understanding, strict privacy and loving ministrations. But that was impossible. In her own way, she too was a victim.

As in life, who is not? She would want to be alone but instead she would have to face the police. Even in these first few moments of shock and terror and numbing surprise, the widow of Doctor Baldwin must answer Thatcher Colt's questions, must allow the uttermost intimacies of her married life to be invaded, pried into, dangled before her, to be identified, analyzed and explained away. To Colt, as to me, this is and will always be the most distasteful feature of police work.

But there is no escape. Here as everywhere else the quest of truth does not lie down a pleasant path. Thatcher Colt stood before Mrs. Hugh Baldwin and spoke to her kindly, explaining the necessity for questioning her. But she put the Commissioner immediately at ease. In a low voice and with her round blue eyes fixed upon him clearly, she said:

"I know that Hugh has died suddenly and I know that he was called in last night upstairs, so I am not surprised to find you here and I am ready to answer your questions."

It seemed a brave speech, a courageous attitude, and Colt said as much as he drew up a chair, sat down and faced her, while I drew out notebook and pencil.

"Did your husband return home last night, Mrs. Baldwin?"

"No, but he telephoned."

"About what time?"

"It was after four o'clock."

"Will you tell me what he said?"

"It was a strange conversation, Mr. Colt. I suppose there is no use pretending that Hugh and I were happy together. We weren't. It was my fault, too, I guess. When we were married, I was not like I am today. I had the figure of a little girl. I didn't take care of myself and I just grew to be like I am now. So I couldn't blame Hugh for—well—for looking at other people now and then. I tried to understand. He had never asked me for a divorce. And he was always gentle—but brooding and miserable. If he had asked, I would have given him his freedom, even though I loved him more, much more, than when we were married. I would have done anything for Hugh."

"Last night I stayed home with the children. We had a little New Year's party just among ourselves. We didn't know where Hugh was. The children were all in bed around one o'clock and so was I but I couldn't get to sleep. I know that it was after four o'clock when the telephone rang, and I was so glad too when I heard Hugh's voice. He said he was at the office, that he had come to a decision about our affairs and that he was going over a lot of business matters and that I would hear from him early in the day. It had been a long time, Mr. Colt, since Hugh talked to me like that. His voice was tender. He told me he had missed me. He said he wished things could be as they used to be. And he told me that no matter what he had done he had never stopped loving me. And then he hung up."

For a moment there was silence.

Mrs. Baldwin had not mentioned her visitor of the night before—the mysterious caller of whom we had been told. But Colt held this back.

"Why did you come here this morning?" he asked.

"I had just read the papers," Mrs. Baldwin explained. "I knew perfectly well that Doctor Baldwin had been involved with Lola Carewe, as she called herself, and I knew that she was an evil influence in his life," said Mrs. Baldwin.

"I tried to get Hugh on the telephone," Mrs. Baldwin went on, "but Miss Simon explained that he had gone out."

Here Miss Simon interrupted: "The doctor went out shortly after I arrived this morning, Mr. Colt, and soon after he was gone Mrs. Baldwin telephoned. When he came back I told him that Mrs. Baldwin was on her way to the office. He looked at me without replying, then went into the private office, closing the door.
