unsatisfactory.

Slocum revealed, incidentally, that according to his calculations, the moon began its rendezvous with the sun a few seconds later than predicted and left one second early. Results achieved by the Swarthmore College expedition were described as "mild" by Dr. John U. Miller, one-time mathematics teacher of President Hoover. His instruments were on a plateau at Derby, Vt.

However, disappointing or fruitful the eclipse might have been from a scientific standpoint, the five million who watched it in New England were well satisfied with it as a spectacle.

Even clouds in some sections heightened the effect by creating a dramatic suspense while the two celestial actors moved behind them and by adding to the greenish pallor of the corona a brilliant sulphurous glow. This feature of witnessed.

In some sections, Baily's beads, often linked to a pearl necklace in the heavens, were visible to the naked eye.

When the supreme show of the universe was almost over, the edge of the sun slid from behind the shielding moon. In a flash the stars were gone, it was day again, although a weak and yellow day.

The watching crowds oh-ed and ah-ed and shifted feet and whispered some comment—just to show they were well aware in their hearts that the world's end hadn't been imminent.

NOW SHOWING—"THE CRAWLING WOMAN"

HEART STRINGS

By EDWINA L. MACDONALD
COPYRIGHT, 1932 BY KING FEATURES SYNDICATE, INC.

SYNOPSIS

Lovely, young Patricia Braithwaite agrees to marry wealthy, middle-aged Harvey Blaine because the father she adores is in financial straits. She hopes, however, that handsome Jack Laurence, a young camper whom she only met once—and the only man she ever wanted to kiss her—will rescue her from Blaine. When Jack fails to appear, she turns, in desperation, to Jimmie Warren, her Aunt Pamela's fascinating husband. They become infatuated and Pat breaks her engagement. Aunt Pam is suspicious but blames herself for warning Pat that love fades, inferring that her marriage to Jimmie had failed. Feeling that Pam no longer cares, Jimmie and Pat see no wrong in their "love". Then Jack appears, but Pat tells him he is too late—the emotion he awakened, blossomed to love under another's kiss. Jack, claiming he is the one Pat really cares for, refuses to give up, and the next day moves to her hotel. The contest between Jack and Jimmie for Pat's love is on. Pamela looks on in painful amazement, realizing she still loves her husband. Pat leaves the Warrens' home where she had been since her father's absence, and returns to the hotel, realizing that Jimmie cannot be romantic with her, as long as she is under his protection. To avoid gossip, Pamela decides to have her house redecorated, so she and Jimmie also move to the hotel. Pat now openly appropriates Jimmie, but Jack makes it a point to be with them always. Pat plans to ride mornings to give Jimmie the opportunity to be with her alone but, before he can say a word, Jack offers to accompany her. As the days go by, Pat looks forward to her rides with Jack.

"Little Pat, I've hoped so long, it seems—but only when we ride away together are you yourself and free," said Jack.

But for these mornings Patricia felt that she could not have supported the long days of suspense and doubt and fear that tore at her, robbed her of appetite and kept her in a high fever.

Each morning became a new adventure in beauty and warmth and quiet peace. Each return a torment of awakening.

Jack never mentioned his love for her. But she saw it in his quiet eyes, felt it in his every move. One day toward the end of the second week, as they started to turn back he put out his hand, caught her bridle and looking at her with grave hurt eyes, said:

"Little Pat, I've hoped so long, it seems—but only when we ride away together in the mornings are you yourself and free. At other times—oh, I just wanted to say—I shall always love you, Pat. That's all."

He released her bridle and started his horse, and it seemed to her that there was something final in the quiet statement. As if he resigned her and said farewell. Her heart ached for him. And at the same time she was aware of a sharp resentment—as if he were deserting her, leaving her to the involved and doubtful fate of a love affair with a married man. For "different" and "right" as her love was, she could not fling herself to its involvements, nor deny the doubtful issue.

When Jack spoke again it was about some trivial thing; but there was a forced carelessness in his attitude, a flatness in his voice, as if he pretended to forget that anything portentous had been said between them, and his pretense mocked him. She saw his face lit by the sun, still and pale and masked, a never-to-be-forgotten picture aching against the mind.

She had wild thoughts of asking him to ride on and on with her till they came to his Eagle's Nest where she might rest forever. Perhaps if she never saw Jimmie again she would never think of him in the tormenting way his nearness evoked.

Time started again as they neared the hotel. Cars passing, Rattletrap cars filled with workmen, fine cars filled with golfers and business men. Tourists just arriving. Piles of baggage, roar and throb of cruel credible life. Through the gates at a gallop, half flying.

eyes shining, she dismounted before Jack could reach her side, and was instantly surrounded by a bored group of young people.

Flinging the bridle to a page, her hot young eyes began their wretched quest. . . . Where's Jimmie? I won't even look. He'll see how little I bother about him. Old married man! Over thirty. Think he can make a fool of me. Well, I'll show him others like me. Better looking men than he is. You'll see how much I care about you. . . . Ah, there he is. Ravishing look at Jack. . . .

"Come on, Jack! A swim. A swim. My kingdom for a swim. Come on, everybody. Come on, Arthur. . . ."

Off to the pool followed by "the gang", an old plantation melody reiterating in her mind:

"Come day, go day, Gaud send Sunday—"

Den 'long come ol' blue Monday.

Git along, nigger, on youah toes

Got no money, let alone clothes.

Whicaway you gwine, Gaud he knows.

Git along, git along, min' youah step—

Fightin' wid de debil ain't gwinter 'hep.

Git along! Git along!

Up in Heaben dey's no blue Monday.

Nebber trouble trouble

Till trouble trouble you.

Up in Heaben ever' day Sunday!"

At a small table on that side of the pavilion giving on the sea, and screened from its glare by a blazing bougainvillea vine, Mrs. James Darcy Warren sat with her husband, her slim hands moving among the tea things.

"Where's Pat?" asked Warren, breaking in on something his wife was saying.

Pamela felt suffocated. Nausea unspeakable swept her, but she did not lift the veil of her heavy-lidded eyes. "Dressing, I think. Waiter, will you bring us another pot of water?"

She dropped a slice of lemon in a cup of tea and passed it to Warren. "You know I don't take lemon, Pam," Warren protested in surprise.

She looked up, an indolent smile curving her lips. "I should, after eight years. The fact is, I—wasn't thinking of what I was doing."

Three weeks had passed since her talk with Pat on the beach—three unbelievable weeks of bleeding humiliation and despair. Three weeks in which she had learned with amazement that she knew neither the reaches of her husband's heart, nor of her own.
