THIMBLE THEATER

HEART STRINGS

By EDWINA L. MACDONALD
COPYRIGHT, 1932, BY KING FEATURES SYNDICATE, INC.

SYNOPSIS

Lovely, young Patricia Braithwait agrees to marry wealthy, middle-aged Harvey Blaine because the father she adores is in financial straits. She hopes, however, that handsome Jack Laurence, a young camper whom she only met once—and the only man she ever wanted to kiss her—will rescue her from Blaine. When Jack fails to appear, she turns, in desperation, to Jimmie Warren, her Aunt Pamela's fascinating husband. They become infatuated and Pat breaks her engagement. Aunt Pam is suspicious but blames herself for warning Pat that love fades, inferring that her marriage to Jimmie had failed. Feeling that Pat no longer cares, Jimmie and Pat see no wrong in their "love". Then Jack appears, but Pat tells him he is too late—the emotion he awakened, blossomed to love under another's kiss. Jack, claiming he is the one Pat really cares for, refuses to give up, and the next day moves to her hotel. The contest between Jack and Jimmie for Pat's love is on. Pamela looks on in painful amazement, realizing she still loves her husband. Pat leaves the Warrens' home where she had been since her father's absence, and returns to the hotel, realizing that Jimmie cannot be romantic with her, as long as she is under his protection. To avoid gossip, Pamela decides to have her house redecorated, so she and Jimmie also move to the hotel. Pat now openly appropriates Jimmie, but Jack makes it a point to be with them always. Pat plans to ride mornings to give Jimmie the opportunity to be with her alone but, before he can say a word, Jack offers to accompany her. As the days go by, Pat looks forward to her rides with Jack. He never mentions his love, but, finally, after two weeks, says: "I've hoped so long, but only on these rides are you yourself and free. I just wanted to say I shall always love you, Pat. That's all." Pat feels that he is giving up; she is torn between pity for him and resentment because he is leaving her involved with a married man.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

"There's Pat now," Pam said indifferently.

Jim's eyes followed hers to a veranda thrust out from the hotel like a gigantic finger pointing toward the sea, high above and paralleling the veranda and the ground. Pat hesitated like a stage star pausing on the stairway to give her audience full benefit of the picture she made.

At the foot of the steps Arthur Savage waited, his boyish form beligerently upright, his dark face unsmiling. After her fluttering and nicely timed pause, Pat descended, nodding with the sweet and casual patronage of a princess to the young man. And not one of those prying eyes in the pavilion could have guessed that this cool appearing young person had that afternoon reached a climax, and a desperate resolve. She had waited for Jimmie to contrive a private talk with her. But, though he sought her out publicly, he never even asked her to dance wherein they might have had a few whispered words. She could no longer live on that brief assurance given her at the villa. She had to know what was in his mind. If he wouldn't ask her for a dance, she would ask him where he couldn't refuse.

Arthur followed her to Mrs. Warren's table, and sat down in glowering silence. "Come on, Jimmie! This music is too good to waste," Pat cried, her coral earrings shimmering to her excitement.

Warren hesitated, pushed his chair back. "Pat, do you want—" he began.

"You don't care if he dances first with me, do you, Aunt Pam?" asked Patricia, trying to look like a pouting child.

Pamela turned carelessly to her husband, who still hesitated. "Run

Her heart seemed to stop. "I think, after all, I'd like to dance," she said along, Jimmie," she said with a determinedly casual smile.

"Mrs. Warren, do you care to dance this?" Arthur asked bitterly, as Warren and Patricia left them. "Not particularly, Arthur, but if you want to—"

"Don't!" His tone was violent. "Then we won't," she said with a soft laugh. But a needle thrust caught at her heart. She had feared for days that this passionate son of a Spanish mother might explode at any moment and start the whole winter colony snickering. He had followed Pat about like a lovesick poodle whose mistress has forgotten his existence.

She made her voice steady. "Do you take lemon?"

"I don't want any tea. Mrs. Warren, how long are you going to let this go on?"

Her heart seemed to stop. "I think, after all, I'd like to dance this," she said with a bland smile. "The music is rather good."

"I want to talk to you," he said doggedly, but rose with her. She linked her hand in his arm, her face a mirror of light banter. "And this is no place to talk," she whispered. In louder tones she added: "When the dance is over, if you care to, you may act as my cavalier for a stroll through the grounds. The air is rather humid, don't you think? Pat can pour fresh tea for herself and Jimmie."

The boy, though a fine dancer, seemed unable to keep step. He made no effort to answer Mrs. Warren's flow of small talk. Several times they passed Warren and Pat, who were so absorbed that they did not see them.

"They have no sense of decency even," thought Pamela, with bitterness, watching them from beneath lowered lids.

Warren held Patricia up in a hungry embrace. His eyes devoured her. His breath was labored; and the dark vein on his brow throbbled painfully.

Looking up into his ardent downward face, Patricia's strength ran out of her. She closed her eyes with a little sigh of utter content, sagging against him. All the hurt of his silence these days past was forgotten. He loved her. He loved her. "Oh, Jimmie, let's sneak out," she whispered.
