CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

Pat dressed swiftly, removed the tear stains from her eyes, and ran down the back stairs.

Jack, having a fair idea of why she hadn't come down to dinner, nor to dance, talked gaily as they skirted the grounds to avoid being seen, pretending not to notice her silence.

They came to the beach. He lif-ed her into the boat and pushed out.
When they were past the breakers and ground swells, he shut off the motor and let the boat drift, rock-ing on the tide.

He talked about the night and hotel events, but she was too full of her trouble to keep it to herself.
Presently between sobs and rage she had recounted the whole amazing conversation with her father.
Not even sparing herself her father's last vile words.

Jack put his arm gently around her. He marveled at the wisdom of the old man who had made no objection to her living her life as she chose; put up no argument; had further removed pressure by taking care of her financial situation; then left her with the ugly truth to face.
Left her unable to fortify herself with rebellion and daring. Nothing to rebel against. Nothing to dare.
Nobody to persuade but herself.
The whole burden of decision had been laid on her shoulders. On the one side her father, Paris, an honorable career, independence. . . . On the other. . . . Jack's face grew savage.

"Pat," he said, "will you be leaving—soon?"

"Tomorrow. I can't stand this place any longer."

"What time?"

"On the afternoon train, I suppose. Dad needs a rest. Yes, the late afternoon train. If he wants to we can stop over in Jacksonville.
But I can't stay here another night."

"I'll be back to see you off."

"Be back?"

"Yes. I hate to miss our ride in the morning—especially—as we may not ride together again. But I have to catch that early morning train."

"You're going—to Miami?"

"He didn't answer. She didn't press him. She understood why he must go. . . . Why he couldn't even wait over to be with her that last day. And she felt that there was justice in the savage demand of him, Jimmie had had the best of life in every way—still had it. . . .

The strength Jack had so painfully, so unjustly acquired would bring its first gratification. . . .
She had an impulse to beg him not to go. But shame forbade. She couldn't plead with a man who loved her not to hurt the man she loved. Moreover, though she hated to think of Jimmie being hurt, it gave her an odd sense of satisfaction to know that he would pay for some of the suffering that was hers.

"Well, I suppose I'll have to take you back, Pat. It's very hard to think I may never listen to the sea with you again; may never see you after tomorrow. We've had good times together, haven't we?"

"Yes. But you'll be coming to—New York sometime, won't you, Jack?"

"If I do, of course I shan't stop long."

"But no matter if it's only a few days you can look me up, can't you?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"He didn't answer."

"For the reason you said the other day?"

"Yes."

"But if I'm working."

"You won't be. You'll find untrained girls aren't wanted in stores or telephone exchanges or restaurants. And you wouldn't know how to live on what they earn. If you don't take the money from your father—you'll have to take it from Warren. And—I couldn't bear to see you—if you were doing that.

Pat, if you must go to New York, take the money from your father, dear. It will break his heart to think you're taking it from Warren. Surely from what you've told me about him he doesn't deserve that blow from you."

"No," she said dully, "he doesn't deserve any of the blows I'm giving him. He didn't fly up or rage at me or threaten to throw me out without a cent. He gave me all he had without a minute to think it over, told me I could always come to him if I needed him—and began planning to go to work in his old days, instead of browsing around the historic places of Paris as he longed to do. That's the kind of a father I've got, Jack. . . . How do you suppose he ever had a daughter like me?"

"I don't see how he could have had any other kind," he replied softly.

She looked up in surprise. "You say that when you know I'm—going to break his heart—because I can't break mine? Take Europe and comforts, and ease away from him in his old days? Because if I don't take the money he won't use it."

"You haven't done all this yet, Pat. I doubt if you will."

"It seems as if I've got to, Jack.
You never loved like this, or you'd understand."

He smiled grimly and started the motor.

When they reached the hotel the music had stopped; the lights were beginning to go out. The lounges were almost deserted.

Jack left her at the elevator.

The dinner tray had been removed from her room. She peeped through her father's keyhole. Dark.
He didn't even wait up for me.
He's given me up. . . .

Childish as her first outburst had been, her pain was now far from childish. She tossed all night in the agony of a woman who must not merely choose between father and lover; but in whose hands rested all that made life worth living for a father who gave it all up at her behest without a murmur, asking only that she turn him out to work. . . .

Negro Is Lynched In Arkansas

Crossett, Ark., Sept. 16.—(U.P.)— Another death by lynching was added to the annual toll today after 500 irate citizens dragged Frank Tucker, 24, Negro, from a city hall office last night and hanged him in the jail yard.
