HEART STRINGS

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

Patricia sat up sharply bending toward the woman, trying to pry under those lowered lids. "Do you mean your husband divorced you about Jimmie?"

"No. I don't know what charge he made. I'm sure he didn't know anything about Jimmie. I was too careful. He got the divorce in Florida. But the thing that tore me all up was that he got it. Of course he never sent me any more money after he remarried. I could have had the whole thing, marriage and everything, set aside—he'd claimed a year's residence in Florida and he'd been there only three months."

"Why didn't you? Then sue him."

"I was afraid if I started a fight he might make trouble for Jimmie."

"Oh," Patricia sank back on the couch and stared at the ceiling. Presently she said, "Well, if to protect Jimmie you lost your income, he should have made it up to you."

"He offered to. Insisted on it; but somehow I couldn't take money from a man—like that. You see I love Jimmie. And it just didn't seem right—sort of degrading." She spoke quite simply, as if unaware of anything strange in her confidence to another who loved him. Of course I had a little money of my own and I gave that to Jimmie to invest for me. I've lived the last year on that."

"Of course," she went on, "I didn't know anything about you till—the question of divorce came up. I wouldn't have started with him if I had. I knew he and his wife were estranged, and so I thought he was mine. I don't know just what I'll do about my life—now." She blinked to keep back the tears, then smiled apologetically. "You must think I'm an awful baby. But it's rather a shock—and I care so much for him."

A wave of anger, and also of sympathy, swept Patricia. There was something helpless about Mrs. Brownley and rather naive and self-absorbed. She seemed not to think of their strange relation to each other; having the air of a deeply troubled woman reaching out to another woman, and talking out of the excess of her troubles.

It was evident to Patricia that Myra Brownley had always clung to whomever came to hand when confusion and distress assailed her. That Patricia was in this case the source of her trouble clearly mattered less to her than that here was a strong young willow tree in the midst of a too swift current.

"If I could only do something to make some money!" she said. "But there's nothing in the world I can do. Since this came up I've tried and tried to think of something, anything; but I never learned to do a thing; I have no talent for anything; so there's nothing for me to do, but marry again. And I don't want to marry a man I don't love."

"You'll probably marry Jimmie," said Patricia dryly.

"No. I've thought that all out. You are the one he cares for."

"He told me he cares for you, too. That it was impossible for a man to know you and not care for you. I can see that's true, too."

"Yes, he cares for me in a way. He knows I care so much for him, for one thing. Then he's sorry for me, and feels he owes me something on account of the way my divorce turned out. Aside from the money Nolan sent me, it was so humiliating. But I've told Jimmie I didn't want him to think of that."

"But, of course, he would."

"Yes, I suppose so. Still—you are the one he really cares for."

"I think his wife is the one he really loves," observed Patricia. "Somehow it's the thing I never thought of before. Maybe she cares for him even. Marriage seems such

"I was afraid if I started a fight he might make trouble for Jimmie," said Myra.

a jumble of unexpected and unexpected things."

There was a loud rap on the door and a ring. Patricia admitted Raymond Georges who had recently published a book.

He threw a cushion on the floor and began telling them the idea for his next novel.

Mrs. Brownley listened to him—Patricia wondered if she really listened. She sat in what Patricia had at Palm Beach termed her listening attitude, elbows on her chair arms, beautiful fingers resting lightly on the points of her shoulders. Now and again she would lift her hands, palms out, approaching, but not touching her face so that one had an impression of a frame that drew the eyes to loveliness.

She was clearly impressed by Georges whose name she knew, as did everyone—since his last book; and he was charmed with her. He invited them to the Dome.

It was twelve in the morning. Patricia had worked steadily for two hours without interruption. Mrs. Brownley watching, making not even a movement of her hands to catch the eye of the busy girl and distract her.

It was amazing how intimate these two had become in a week's time.

Had Patricia met the woman under ordinary circumstances she would never have selected her as an intimate. First, because there were six years difference in their ages. . . . Mrs. Brownley had been married. She was idleness embodied. And Patricia was action. But they had been flung together as it were, out of space; linked by common interest in a man who had left them together in an unspeakable situation.

Once out of the particular situation which had turned them toward each other that first night, they might have parted, but for Mrs. Brownley. . . . Finding herself in a threatening current, it appeared that she had no resources which to keep herself afloat. She would phone of mornings, "Had breakfast yet? I'm lonesome and blue. Won't you give me a cup of coffee if I come over? I just hate myself this morning. I promise not to bother you."

And she never did. Myra Brownley had, among other gifts, the rare quality of quiet. She could lie on a couch or sit deeply and restfully in a chair reading or staring into space, making not even the sound of turning pages, nor attracting the eye by a movement. She neither jabbered nor spoke at intervals.

"Let's have some lunch," said Patricia, suddenly laying down her pallet and brushes.

They went into the little kitchen with its breakfast compartment. "What can I do?" asked Myra, with the air of helpless dismay she always had in a kitchen.

"Nothing. I'm just going to make tea and fry some eggs. I think I'll have two. How about you?"

"Don't you mind? I always break the yolk. I must be stupid. I don't seem able to learn the simplest things about cooking."

Sometimes Patricia was dimly annoyed by Mrs. Brownley's in ability even to make a cup of coffee or fry eggs. What if she hadn't done it! Neither had Patricia. But one could not be definitely annoyed—the woman was so unobtrusive—so pleasant, berated her own stupidity with such sweet regret. And she had her uses in Patricia's troubled scheme. She filled those spaces when work was done and Daddies was out or resting. Spaces Jack had been wont to fill for so long. Nobody had seen him in over a week. Georges had called at his place several times; but he was never in. For all Patricia knew he may have returned to America.

And more than she had even needed action, movement, company. She needed it now. She could not endure rest. Her own society for even ten minutes was an abomination.

Thus she let Mrs. Brownley cling to her, and in a sense she clung to Mrs. Brownley. The woman was always ready to go shopping for groceries, prowling in at shops, drifting through the Louvre, idling along Rue de Rivoli, looking at beaded bags and other gewgaws which neither of them wanted, and her pleasant trivial conversation formed a stopgap against trooping thoughts.
