CHAPTER XXXIX

Just looking at Barney copped up like that was enough. They remembered Barney at Lincoln. He talked to them over the phone again in the morning. Thinking of Barney kept their minds on the job. They won from the Cornhuskers with a touchdown to spare. Stone had a big day with two long runs.

"I'm holding my breath," Pidge said. "It don't seem like it can be true. Barney laid up and we lick Indiana, Navy and Nebraska. But they don't mean a thing if we lose to Tech."

"This is the one we've got to win." Tech! The jinx team which had come from nowhere to beat New Dominion twice—and then boast about it. The team which had definitely stamped this same gang as the poorest Barney Mack had ever coached by giving them their third defeat in a season.

The team which had to be licked or nothing else counted; and Barney Mack in bed. The country, caught by the drama of Barney's comeback, would be watching this game to see if Tech could do it again.

Barney told the doctors he was going; shook off their arguments. But Doctor Morgan accompanied him, and put him to bed in Cleveland. Barney received visitors there all day in his room at the Athletic Club; he chatted with reporters, told stories like the Barney of old, inquired about other teams, passed out complimentary tickets.

"See, Doc," he said, "I'm better off here in the middle of things than at home wondering what's happening." At five o'clock they dressed him, put him in the wheel chair and rolled him to a basketball court on the same floor. There he sent them through a dummy scrimmage against Tech formations.

Ted and Pidge went to his room at seven o'clock for their usual conference on the night before a game. The door was closed. Doctor Morgan told them.

"He fell asleep; too much excitement today and the sleep will do him good. You can see him tomorrow." But word got around that he had taken a turn for the worse; that if the clot broke from its moorings and hit his head or his heart—

Ted went with Pidge to his home for awhile. Talked about this and that; but they couldn't get settled. Phyllis was beautiful but faintly annoying. They told Pidge's father about Barney.

"We've got to win that game," Pidge blurted; tears were coming. His folks had never seen Pidge that way. Phyllis put her arms about him—made Ted wonder what he might have missed by not having a sister; Pidge was like a brother.

They went back to the hotel. No more word from Barney.

But Barney was at the clubhouse the next afternoon, a half hour before game time, sitting outside the door in his car when the squad came in from limbering up. They had to pass him to get to the door. He was sitting stiffly, bundled with clothing, looking straight ahead. His face wasn't sad but there was something sad about him—the same thing you saw in pictures of Harry Halbert.

CONGRESSMEN URGE MOVES TO LEGALIZE BEER

would increase the yield of present taxes, would balance the budget. Drys on the other hand estimated the yield of a beer tax at as low as $50,000,000.

Inside they waited. Somebody said he didn't get to sleep until three in the morning that he had passed out. They sat around the floor on blankets, on stools and benches. Bob was placing two tables together for Barney to sit on. They looked at the tables. Bob was carrying Barney in—Barney was being carried in. It was like watching a funeral.

His leg was dragging. It hurt—you could tell by his face. Bob placed him on the two tables with his back against the wall. Ted saw a shiny black overshoe on one tan boot. The other leg was stretched out, covered with blankets.

Barney sat there, looking straight into the iron of the lockers. Ted was biting his lip. Pidge looked up at Barney, dropped his head, crying. Pat peered up from under his brows like a scared kid. Stone looked at his feet. Brute was shaking—his jaw quivering.

A few alumni, personal friends of Barney, were in the shower room where he couldn't see them. Barney was looking straight ahead.

Joe Stern and Doc Reedy were crying. Ted knew what they were all thinking. Barney might die. This game might kill Barney. He might never leave this room.

Barney looked straight ahead. Sad face. He was going to start. His voice was strong. "There's been a lot of water passed under the bridge since I first came to New Dominion—but I don't know when I've ever wanted to win a game as badly as this one. I don't care what happens after today."

"Why do you think I'm taking a chance like this?" "To see you lose. . . . They'll be primed. They'll be tough. They think they have your number."

"Are you going to let it happen again?" "You can win if you want to." If they wanted to. "Go on out now and crack 'em. Crack 'em. Crack 'em. Fight to live. Fight to live. Fight to live."

He was shouting; pouring himself out. The squad arose with an angry roar; ran from the room in single file. Ted, waiting until last, saw that Barney was near collapse. His eyes were shut; his face in pain; the doctor was gently mopping sweat from his brow; feeling his pulse.

Barney was ready to give everything. All for a football game. Why? Fight to live. My God!

Just before the game started they wheeled Barney around the cinder track to the bench. The frosty, furry horseshoe applauded. Little did they know how much Barney was showing them about fight.

Show those mugs. Second team started. . . . Things went badly. . . . The boys were too anxious; too nervous; they stopped Tech and gained themselves but fumbles stopped the advances.

Barney had guts. Sitting there, he was more nearly himself than at any time since he had been ill.

In this respect. The congress that meets in December is the same one that refused to modify the Volstead act last session, but it is expected to be much more favorably inclined toward beer.

Would help Prisons. Washington, Nov. 11—(UP)—Federal prison officials believe repeal or modification of prohibition would greatly relieve overcrowded conditions in federal penitentiaries.

Prohibition violators in federal prisons number about 4,500, or 35 per cent of the entire federal penal population. These prisoners annually cost the government about $1,050,000 to keep.

Prohibition laws have unquestionably increased the number of federal prisoners and cost the taxpayers additional money. Prison Director Sanford Bates said today.

"We have about twice as many prisoners at the Atlanta and Leavenworth penitentiaries as the institutions should normally serve. Prohibition has been responsible for a great share of the overcrowding."

Richard Wilscher, railroad laborer, and Margaret Stoner, Adams county.

He said nothing about the mistakes on the field; dropped constructive comment to Ted, who sat next to him.

"Left guard tips off the play. . . . Left tackle is dropping back. . . . Stone ought to go against him on 84. . . . They're hitting hard but waiting. . . . Force it, get your lead."

At the quarter the first team went in. Hard football. Tech fought with clenched lips. No chatter here. Grim, bitter smiles occasionally after a fierce, crunching tackle.

Brute was a demon; it was pitiful to see the look in the eyes of the Tech men who had to face him. Pat was a splendid body relentlessly hurling himself into every play.

Crunching bones. Brutal collision. Thudding impact. And all so silent—like animals fighting for the last bone.

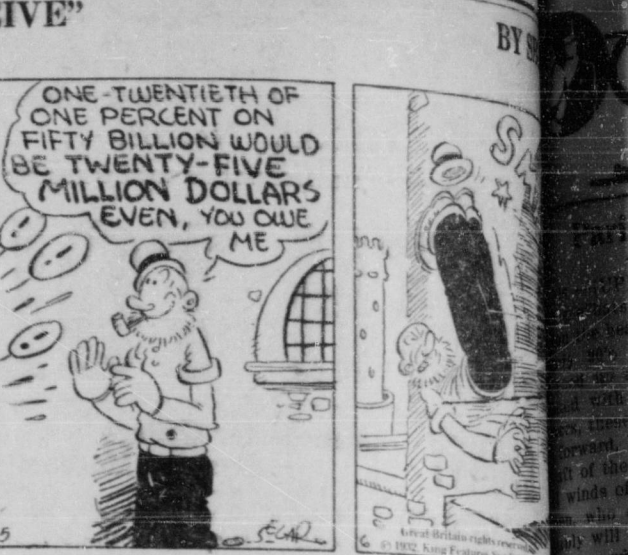

Pidge, close to hysteria, was wrecking them if they got through the line; sometimes Ted was afraid to look; but Pidge always got up. The kid would surprise you today, Mr. Pidge.

No quarter, here. Ted knew how they felt. Once, a Tech end took a pass in the flat. Ted came up fast, picked him up, carried him back four steps and flung him down—and laughed at him, hoping it broke his head.

And he had never seen the boy before. But Tech didn't have Barney waiting on the bench. Tech didn't wait in that dressing room, wondering whether he would die.

Tech was only a football team—dying gamely. New Dominion was a football team—fighting to live.

Tech began to give ground. Defeat was in their faces. Just before the half ended Stone slipped through one of Brute's openings for thirty-five yards. First down on the ten-yard line. How much time? Pass on the first down—Stone just missed it. Whistle. And no score.
