Boston Men Pioneers

Those who sit indoors in comfort in the cold New England winters may thank two Boston men, James Jones Walworth and Joseph Mason, who back in 1844 went into business together and "agreed to risk their money to a scheme for installing a new heating device in business houses and residences." To this company belongs the early development of steam and hot water heating of buildings.

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

Ellis made shift to move away.
But the cold, calculating Bundy resolutely stood his ground. He tightened his thin lips, and shook his head.

"It will not serve, Charley. We know the message that she carries now. We don't know the message she may carry if you speak to her apart."

"You don't trust me?" He seemed genuinely taken aback.
Bundy spat thoughtfully. "I'd rather trust myself if it comes to trusting anybody."

"But what could I do? What other message could I possibly send? What bargain could I drive for myself, since that must be what's in your mind?"

"I don't know, but, not knowing, we'll keep on the safe side. Come, man. Take your leave here. What the devil! You're man and wife, ain't ye? What need to be coy?"

Monsieur de Bernis sighed, and smiled again, a little sadly. "So, Priscilla. There is no more to say.
It is perhaps just as well." He bent and kissed her. It was his intention to kiss her cheek; but she turned her lips fully to meet his own.

"Charles!" she said again, in that low, anguished voice.

Monsieur de Bernis stepped back, and waved to Halliwell. The tormented shipmaster obeying the signal picked her up in his arms, and waded out to bestow her in the stern-sheets of the waiting boat.

Then the Major and Pierre followed, swung each a leg over the side, took their places on the thwarts, and got out the sweeps.
The buccaners gave the boat a forward thrust, and so she was launched upon her voyage, a little white flag of truce fluttering in her bows.

Monsieur de Bernis stood with the wavelets rustling at his feet watching the boat for a little while. Priscilla did not look back.
She sat in the stern-sheets, with her shoulders to the shore, a little crumpled figure in green. At last he turned, and very slowly, with his chin sinking into the ruffles at his throat, he moved up the beach, Bundy and Ellis following him with no word spoken.

In the longboat Priscilla was softly weeping, so that at last Pierre, who sat beyond the Major, was moved to comfort her. He spoke to her over the Major's shoulder.

"Mademoiselle," he begged her in French, "do not weep. There is no need. All will be well with Monsieur de Bernis. He knows what he is doing. Believe me, all will be well with him."

"And, anyway," said the Major,
"it's no great matter if it isn't."

Thus he expressed the bitterness aroused in him by that little scene he had witnessed at the water's edge. It provided a fitting, exasperating climax to all that he had been constrained to endure in this past month. It was high time, he thought, to restore things to their proper places in their lives. High time that Priscilla should recover the perspective which she appeared, from her latest conduct, utterly to have lost. The vision of that kiss was something that had haunted the Major, and set his memory shuddering with horror.

Roughly, then, did he attack the business of correcting the focus of Miss Priscilla's mental sight.

His words certainly had the immediate effect of checking her tears. Momentarily, at least, her concern, anxiety, and grief were overcome by indignation. From a white, tear-stained face her eyes blazed as they encountered the Major's.

"What do you dare to say?" she asked him, with such scornful anger that he would not have had the
