Perennials for Fall Sowing

Many perennial flowers may be sown this fall. The long winter months prepare the seed for early germination in the spring. Some perennials seeded in the spring fail to grow until the following year. Irises, perennial phlox, the gas plant (dictamnus fraxinella) and delphiniums often show this trait, and the seedlings will seldom germinate until the following spring.

Delphiniums, columbines, gailardias, foxgloves, cantenbury bells, peachleaved bellflowers, and coreopsis may be sown in the fall. Primrose seed, too, will show added germination if sown now. And besides that, you save so much work from the season of the year when you are the busiest.

Perennial seeds should be sown in rows, and grown there until such time when they are large enough to transplant. Remember that the greatest danger to plants of this type is the likelihood of being washed away by heavy rains. This, of course, is always a hazard to planting of this nature, and precautions should be taken against it. A wooden curb around the seed bed will prevent water washing across it. When spring comes you can protect your seedlings by frames covered with wind screen. A large proportion of your crop is apt to be destroyed without some such protection, and these methods are often used by commercial nurseries. Wind, and the force of driving rains are ward-off quite effectively.

Growing irises from seed has become a popular pastime in recent years. You should plant your seeds this fall. Siberian, Japanese, and the tall bearded varieties will give the best result. Fall planting will assure you of hardy plants next spring, whereas spring sowing might disappoint.

Perennial aster seed should be sown now if you want beautiful plants next fall. If you would eliminate the deadly toll of seedlings that the hot mid-summer sun takes, be very careful in preparing your seed-bed. Rake in a good supply of plant food before sowing your seed and you will get the best results.

A party of fishermen operating after the hurricane reported an unprecedented catch of red fish. Old timers say fishing always is improved after a gulf storm. They say it is because of the high tides rolled in from the ocean by the wind.

Ten Women Expert Parachute Packers

Washington. (UP)—Ten women in the United States are licensed by the Department of Commerce to repair and repack parachutes, department figures show.

Regulations of the air division of the Commerce Department require that parachutes must be repacked and inspected for any possible flaw every 60 days. "Riggers" who do this work must be licensed by the department.

A total of 312 persons hold licenses for this work, including the ten women. They must first unpack the chute, examine the silk canopy, shroud lines and harness for breaks or weak places. Any minor defects found can be repaired by the riggers themselves, but in case of a major repair the work must be done by the manufacturer. After this task is completed the rigger repacks the chute and it goes into service for another 60 days.

FAVORS FROM THE GODS!

Since the first man found the first precious stone and gave it to his cavewoman to enhance her beauty, the mystic properties of superstitions, the stories, myths and legends about precious stones have grown and been handed down by the human race.

Of the 1200 mineral species now known to science, only about 100 possess the beauty and durability that entitle them to be classed as gems. And about all of these have grown up these mystic legends.

Are you interested in your birthstone? Want to know the mystic properties about gems and their planetary influence? Do you know the precious stone represents each of the Twelve Apostles?
