M. during the tax paying period. All taxes not paid by that time will become delinquent and a 3% penalty will be added. County orders will not be paid to anyone owing delinquent taxes. All persons are warned against them.

SYNOPSIS

The colorful career of "Big Jeff" Randolph, now a national football hero, has been traced from his humble home in tiny Athens, a mid-west factory town, through high school gridiron stardom that made him a magnet for scouts from big colleges and through two years of backfield glory as a superstar at Thorndyke, rich and historic eastern university. He's the idol of fandom, the pet of society, the envy of back-home neighbors, and "my boy" to his adoring Mom and Pop. To the former, he's still her little Tommy and to father, well—Tom's manners and clothes annoy the veteran glassworker who secretly, however, rates his boy on a par with Pop's supreme political favorite, Al Smith. Before Thorndyke had put a high hat sort of halo on him, Tommy's best girl was Dorothy Whitney, daughter of the richest and most important citizen in Athens. But in New York, Tommy has met Elaine Winthrop, society artist and daughter of a Wall Street magnate. As the climax to his most brilliant season, "The Kid's Last Game" comes, with Yale leading Thorndyke, 7-0, as the first half ends. . . . Jeff Randall, Dorothy Whitney's escort to the game, seems pleased with "Big Jeff's" discomfiture that day.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

"I should think so," Jerry said in relief, "who do these Yales think they are, anyhow—don't they know it's the Kid's last game?"

A touch of defeat might be good for Jeff Randolph—and Tommy. It might let him know there was something else in the world than victory and adulation and pampering. Unconsciously Dorothy's eyes wandered to Elaine Winthrop. The young lady was bundled in mink today but she still revealed plenty of waxen limb to appreciative males; her chin and her nose were a little sharper than Dorothy's had thought; her eyes were disapproving and her lips petulant. There was something about the thinness of the girl that convinced Dorothy of something a boy like Tommy would never suspect—that there were tiny lines beneath the chemistry of her complexion, that Elaine was older than she appeared, a woman more than a girl. It was vaguely disquieting.

Their eyes met. Elaine did not alter her expression but her glance frankly inspected Dorothy's clothing and then, without giving a verdict, returned to the marching bands on the field. Dorothy wondered what Tom had told Elaine of her. The boy with the black bear coat, hanging to his heels like a cassock, was Elaine's escort; he was standing, waving his shaggy arms at a group ten rows down.

"Who is Freddy?" Dorothy asked.

"Freddy," Jerry answered with an amused smile, "is a sort of emotional bodyguard. She's been carrying him around for years."

"Blue-blood?"

"So refined it'll be alcohol in another generation."

Yale knew it was the Kid's last game. Yale had been telling him with savage tactics, with hefty blockings, with the conversational pleasantries reserved for the star of the year on the day when he is not clicking—when nothing is going right.

Nothing went right for Tom. He couldn't get started; his men weren't blocking—or, as sometimes happened, the opposition just wouldn't be blocked. Eli was riding high, wide and handsome and was tossing the oil of recklessness upon the flames of victory.

Tom went out in the second half determined to shake it off; he brought back the kickoff to the 25-yard line but was stopped abruptly when two men, who had brushed by blockers, hit him high-low. As they got up one said to the other: "Do you smell anything around here?" Tom bit his lips. He rammed into the line—for two yards. Grogan, the Yale tackle, had him pinned. "You don't seem to be feeling well, Jeff—and it don't look like you'll be going to California to recuperate."

Tom kicked—a long one which Verger picked out of the air on a high bounce and brought back 13 yards for a first down on the Eli 37-yard line. The Bulldogs bristled all along the line. The Pilgrims dug in—Randolph shuttled back and forth, encouraging them.

"Save it for the reporters, Jeff," Grogan laughed. "We're on our way."

And they were. In four plays Yale travelled 63 yards for another touchdown. Harlow made nine at tackle; Verger skimmed the same end for 15—then Jardien went wide on the same side, caught a lateral in the clear as the defenders dove for Verger, and was off along the sidelines; four times he was bumped but he refused to go down until Randolph caught him with a spread-eagle swoop on the three-yard line.

Harlow rammed through for the touchdown on the first play. Harlow kicked the goal.

The score was Yale 14, Thorndyke 0.

Dorothy watched Tom trudging to his place. He seemed spiritless. Even Jerry was sorry for him. The Thorndyke crowd was asking what was wrong with Big Jeff; Elaine was calmly touching up her delicately generous lips. Freddy was up, pleading with Jeff, his team, the coach and the gods to do something.

"What is it, Dad?"

Charlie Whitney shrugged his shoulders. "They're just too good, that's all. Yale is a good team; right now they're a great team; when a team gets red hot they just ride everything out of the way. We'll have to get some kind of a break to shake them off. If Tom could only get away once—but his blockers can't stop those linemen. Nobody can do the job alone."

On the field the Bulldogs were surging.
