CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

The people around town hadn't forgotten Tommy even if the papers had and Mom wished he would write oftener because somebody was always asking how he liked it, how his picture was coming along, when was it coming to Athens, and—What did he think about Clara Bow? Did he have any dates with Greta Garbo? Was it true that John Greentree was a dope fiend? And that Elsie Mountfort, was drunk all the time?

Charlie Whitney asked about him. He told Mom he had a place for Tom in the factory after he graduated but that he couldn't afford to pay five hundred dollars a week or anything like that. He told Mom to keep in touch with him and tell him how Tommy was getting along and any changes he made since the job was still open at the factory even though times were getting hard because the factory needed young blood and Tommy was just the type he needed. . . he knew the town and had a lot of contacts and was so well educated.

Mom thanked Charlie for being so interested in Tommy and for the interest he had always taken in him since he was a little boy and she told him how well Pop always spoke of him too. Charlie laughed a little and seemed kind of embarrassed and Mom was, too. She had met him coming out of the bank. Then she asked how Dorothy was and told him how relieved she had been when Dorothy had come to tell her Tommy was all right that time he was hurt. Mom wanted to ask about the grandmother, too, but she couldn't bring herself to it because the old woman had never even wanted Charlie to talk to Mom when they were both young.

The neighbor ladies at the grocery store were always interested in Hollywood, too. Mrs. Flannigan always was wanting her to ask Tommy what had become of Tommy Meighan because he was her "favorite" and Mrs. Johnson liked Wallace Beery because he was a real man and didn't put on any frills or fancies. Mrs. Farrell didn't talk much because it was easy to see she was jealous of everything Tommy ever did. The funniest one, though, was Butcher Brown who was always wanting to know if Clara Bow was asking for him and when Tommy was going to get a job in the movies for . . . his cat, Albert!

Cousin Emmy worried Mom for awhile. She had some big idea about getting a pass and going out to Hollywood to visit Tommy. Mom knew just how glad Tommy would be to see Cousin Emmy come piling in on him because he never could stand her, anyhow; yet, she was crazy about the movies and Mom believed that down in her heart Cousin Emmy thought she was pretty and could play-act herself. Mom told this to Pop and Pop said she'd be sure to break all the machines if they tried to take Emmy's picture. And there was another thing: Cousin Emmy was the kind who went crazy over sheiks and Mom knew, if she went out there and ever saw Clark Gable or Buddy Rogers on the street, she would be sure to run right up to them and yell out loud and make some kind of a fool out of herself, and Tommy wouldn't like that.

Mom's heart jumped . . . a telegram always meant something important and . . . Mom "always expected the worst"

Mom was afraid she would have to hurt the poor thing's feelings but, as luck happened, business was slack on the railroads and Cousin Emmy's husband got bumped and had to go back firing instead of running an engine; and that changed his hours and cut down the money and everything all around. Even then Cousin Emmy hinted around to Mom about her husband coming to live with the Randolphs while she went to Hollywood; but Mom pretended not to take the hint although she did feel sorry because Cousin Emmy's heart was so set on the trip. But the house was crowded already and Uncle Louie was had enough without taking in any more; and they said Cousin Emmy's husband slept in his underwear anyhow and got the sheets all dirty, and he was a dumb kind of a man anyhow; he wore black underwear.

Then, the Saturday before Thanksgiving, the telegram came. Mom was sitting in the front room mending socks. The light was better in there and her eyes were beginning to bother her on the close work so she sat in there; and it was company, too, because she could see people going by. She saw the Jenkins boy coming down the street and knew it was a telegram but she had no idea it was ever for her until he made a hop, step and a jump, and landed on the porch so hard he didn't have to ring the bell. "A telegram from Tom, Miss Randolph," he said.

Mom's heart started to jump right away because a telegram always meant something important and Mom was the kind that always expected the worst. Tommy was away from home and alone, and a lot of things began to jump into her mind; but the Jenkins boy said, before her trembling fingers could sign for it: "He's coming home." Then he hopped away again, hitting the tops of the fence posts as he went, as if he had just told her it was a nice day. Mom tore open the envelope and there it was, dated Kansas City and it said:

"I see you get a telegram," she said. Nobody ever missed a thing on that street, Mom thought; but she said: "Yes, Tommy's coming home and is bringing a friend. He's driving through it. It came from Kansas City. Can I use your phone, Miss Johnson?"

"Just help yourself," Mrs. Johnson said. Mrs. Johnson pretended to be busy in the kitchen while Mom phoned but Mom knew she was all ears so she just kind of hinted around to Cousin Emmy and Cousin Emmy, all excited, said she'd be right over and would fetch her good bedspread she had won at the bazaar and her floor lamp. And she must have flew over because Mom had hardly got home when Cousin Emmy got in all out of breath; and when she saw the telegram she said:

HENRY FORD MAY LOSE CONTRACTS

sign the temporary Blue Eagle agreement. He declined to participate in formulation of the permanent automobile code. He has been extremely cool toward the national labor board.

Even though Ford may be meeting the requirements of the automobile code, NRA officials welcomed the war department's decision as in keeping with the government's exhortations to the public to buy only from those who display the Blue Eagle. Some quarters, however, suggested that Ford might have basis for contesting the army's action if it rejects his bids solely because he has not signed the code and is not displaying the Blue Eagle. Usual government procedure requires contracts to be awarded to lowest bidder who meet specifications.

M. during the tax paying season. All taxes not paid by that time will become delinquent and a 3% penalty will be added.
