GOVERNORS TO URGE ADOPTION OF RELIEF PLAN

The committee was instructed to recommend less stringent regulations be placed on loans to farmers, that interest rates on all federal loans to farmers be reduced and that a farm debt conciliation committee be appointed to administer these functions.

The proposal for an NRA code, main theme of the conference report, stipulated the code would apply only to "actual farmers" and be administered by men "of the farmers' own choosing." It was suggested the code regulate marketing of raw food products "so as to encourage ultimate ownership and control of the market for farm products by cooperative organizations of producers and eliminate the speculative

CHAPTER FIFTY

Mom still had to laugh at Pop, the way he took everything in like he was up there on the screen himself, wagging his head and dropping that eye down. Mom could hardly enjoy the picture sometimes for fear Pop would answer the Coach when he was bawling out Tommy. Mom didn't think it was very nice herself but she supposed it was just part of the play—and anyhow, Tommy didn't pay much attention to the Coach anyhow, but kept on looking right out at the audience until Mom was sure he was giving her a message. But it all came right in the end, after Tommy made his big run and then the drop-kick and everybody started to go out. Mom began to get her things on but Pop wouldn't budge.

"There's another show," he told Mom and there was nothing for her to do but sit there as he wouldn't pay any attention when she told him people would talk about them for staying to see it twice and George Kauffman had only reserved the seats for one show and would want to sell them again because a big crowd was standing up in the back. And Mom thought it would be nice to go out with everybody else and see what they thought of the way Tommy had acted. Cousin Emmy got up, though, and Mom thought, at least the second show would be more enjoyable; but just as she was thinking this, Cousin Emmy told Mom not to let anybody take her seat because she'd be back; and she went down the aisle with the Maybells and R. K. Washburn, pulling their coat sleeves and wagging their head and showing her buck teeth as if anybody cared what she thought.

Pop slept through all of the other pictures and Mom tried to nudge him and wake him up because it wasn't very flattering to George Kauffman; but he gave her a look and Mom was afraid he'd embarrass her so she let him sleep; but he must have had one eye open for as soon as Tommy came on again he was wide awake; and he went through the same performance, mumbling to himself, but there was one consolation—he hadn't taken his shoes clear off and he got them on all right, and he walked out like he came in, paying no attention to anybody and pulling Mom along when somebody wanted to stop and shake hands with her.

But all night long and the next morning while she was working around the house after Pop and Pete had gone to work, Mom couldn't forget Uncle Louie. While she and Pop were walking out, she had noticed him over in the corner of the back row, all by himself, and pretending that he wasn't there; so Mom pretended she hadn't seen him. She had to feel sorry for him, off by himself when he liked to be important; and the only thing that could figure out was that he hadn't come down to sit with them because he didn't have his white shirt and tie any more. The more Mom thought of it, the more she was sure that was what was making him so cranky—he had changed for the worse ever since he had had to quit wearing the white shirt and tie, the poor old fellow. People were funny.

At Butcher Brown's the neighbor ladies were all talking about the show; and sure enough Butcher Brown said if Albert was in the movies that "Mickey Mouse" wouldn't be so smart; and just like he knew he was being talked about, didn't Albert get up and box!

"Albert would knock him out in the first round," Butcher Brown said. Then he said to Mom, laughing like he always did: "Tommy was all right in the football part but, if it was me with my arms around that Valeska Mourat, I'd have shown him things about the love stuff."

Everybody laughed; and Mrs. Flannigan and Mrs. Farrell exchanged glances. After Mom had gone, Mrs. Flannigan said to Mrs. Farrell: "Did you hear what Florrie Johnson said?"

Mrs. Farrell's eyes brightened. She moved closer. "No—what did she say?" "Well," Mrs. Flannigan said, "she is supposed to have come out of the Bijou laughing and saying that Valeska Mourat must not be so hot because Tommy wasn't so wooden Indian when she knew him."

Mrs. Farrell's lips moved. "Did anybody tell her that?" "Oh no," Mrs. Flannigan said, "she would have a conviction fit. She thinks he's a little pink angel."

Mrs. Farrell fingered the lettuce. "Well," she said, "from what I hear, Florrie ought to know what she's talkin' about."

"I'll say," said Mrs. Flannigan. Then Mrs. Johnson came in and they stopped talking; but Mrs. Johnson was eager for news.

"From what everybody says," she said, "he was all right on the football but not so good on the love stuff."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Farrell, "we got that on pretty good authority."

Thanks real rough, like it wasn't anything at all and he should have got much better. Tommy had presents for everybody and good ones, too. He brought Pete a pair of fur-lined driving gloves and a chamomile wind-breaker; and Pop got a real, genuine meerschaum pipe only he called it meersham; and there were days after when Mom was sorry because you would have thought it was made of gold and diamonds the way Pop valued it and yelled at anybody who hardly looked at it. Mom got special instructions on how to make the little chamomile covering for it while it was being colored. Of course Uncle Louie had to drop it while he was examining it and Pop's eyes got wild even though it had only dropped on the sofa and didn't have any chance of breaking. But Uncle Louie hardly paid any attention to Pop at all because he was so busy looking at himself in the mirror in his new shirt and tie. He felt his importance again and Mom was kind of glad of it, even though he would be a trial.

Mom was glad when they all sat down to dinner and she and Steve set to work serving the meal. Steve was all rosy-cheeked and happy as she always was on Christmas and Mom knew it was the best Christmas the poor girl had had because on her finger was the diamond Pet had bought her and Steve was busy keeping her hand fixed so she could look at it no matter what she was doing. Mom had bought her a compact at the drug store and she couldn't have pleased Steve any more if it had been filled with diamonds. Steve wasn't hard to please and any little thing at all anybody did for her made her happy. Then Mom happened to think and she went upstairs and brought down the pair of silk stockings Tommy had brought home for her and told Steve they were from Tommy only she shouldn't say thanks to him or anything because he'd rather have it that way.

Tommy just hadn't thought of Steve, Mom knew, and it was well worth the trouble to see Steve's face. "Oh, Mom," she whispered, "do you really think he approves of me?" Mom told her sure, not to worry, because Tommy was not the kind who showed his feelings much. Mom wasn't quite so sure but she knew nobody could help liking Steve when they got to know her, because she had such a big heart. And Mom could afford to give the stockings a way because Tommy had also brought her a pair of kid gloves and a suitcase with a comb and brush and mirror in it and a little box to put soap in and a little box to put powder in. Mom knew it was just like the society matrons had and it was one of the fancy things she had always wanted but which she could never afford for herself. She told Tommy he shouldn't be wasting his money on her and he said there was nobody better he could spend it on and that was only the beginning; and Mom thought that was real nice although Uncle Louie sniffed up his nose; which he should, the old gander, considering he had never bought anybody even a handkerchief—although he never really had much money to spare.

promised to prevent mortgage foreclosures and evictions by using "any and all means within our executive power . . . until such mortgagors shall have reasonable opportunity to avail themselves of credit facilities offered by the federal government."

Officials of cooperative farm organizations having a membership of more than 3,500,000 mid-west farmers, many of whom have been engaged in a strike to force federal relief action, approved the three-point program.

Milo Reno, president of the Farmers Holiday Association, which is sponsoring the strike movement, hailed the program as a "great victory." He refused, however, to order the strike halted.

Reno urged members of the association to hold all their produce on the farms in anticipation of higher prices and as a threat "in case the governors fail in their demands." It was indicated active picketing will be halted temporarily, however.

Arnold Gilberts, president of the Wisconsin Farm Holiday Association, ordered the strike halted in that state. Walter Singler, president of the Wisconsin cooperative milk pool, which controls 90 per cent of the milk production of the state, said however that the strike called yesterday by his organization would continue "at least until Friday."
