Pet Targets Gone

Chadron, Neb. (U.P.)—Extinction during the summer of a 100,000-acre prairie dog town near here by members of the Civilian Conservation Corps has brought an end to a favorite sport of western Nebraska marksmen. For years, the diminutive and elusive rodents were a favorite target.

Frats Plan Group Buying

Middletown, Conn.—(U.P.)—A proposal for a central purchasing agency to buy supplies wholesale for the fraternities at Wesleyan University is being considered by the secret societies, with a six months trial of the plan probable. James L. McConaughy, president of Wesleyan, suggested the plan and pointed out the fraternities could make appreciable savings under central agency. Six fraternities already have endorsed the idea.

KNAVE'S GIRL

By JOAN CLAYTON
COPYRIGHT 1932, KING FEATURES SYNDICATE, INC.

SYNOPSIS

Fear that Bill McGee, the racketeer, would wreak vengeance on her and her family if she refused to go out with him, caused lovely Patricia Warren to accept his invitations. Bill is shot by a rival gangster while in Pat's company. Pat rushes home in terror and her stepmother puts her out, saying the police are looking for Pat. Unable to find employment, Pat resorts to her card skill and plays professional bridge. Julian Haverholt, noted bridge expert, makes her his partner. While they are discussing business details at his home, Clark Tracy, the polo player and Pat's secret love, calls. She had met him once but he does not recognize her. Haverholt introduces Pat as his niece. She is indignant, but he explains later that he was thinking of her card skill and plays professional bridge. Julian Haverholt, noted bridge expert, makes her his partner. While they are discussing business details at his home, Clark Tracy, the polo player and Pat's secret love, calls. She had met him once but he does not recognize her. Haverholt introduces Pat as his niece. She is indignant, but he explains later that he was thinking of her card skill and plays professional bridge.

"You're prettier in the gold, anyhow," he added defensively.

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

"How much did we win?" persisted the girl.

"Eleven thousand, four hundred dollars. A big night, Patricia."

Suddenly, unexpectedly, Patricia burst into tears. Everything was all wrong, the world was all awry. Somehow, she had lost herself, her own identity. Somehow, imperceptibly but surely, she had become a big time gambler, winning from people unwilling to lose, playing fair, yes, but nevertheless, for enormous stakes. She was accepted everywhere, but accepted because she played a brilliant game of cards, because Julian Haverholt was there to back her up in a lie. She had won ten thousand dollars in a single night. It seemed to her that she had paid for that victory in the coin of her own youthful decency, her own fineness, her own ideals. Under the spell of this man's personality she had yielded up her very self, had surrendered the right to live her own life in her own way. She was not Patricia Warren any more; she was Patricia Haverholt.

For a moment, Julian Haverholt looked at the sobbing girl in a kind of disconcerted bewilderment. Then, leaning over he gathered her into his arms. She wept against his shoulder quietly, hopelessly. No one telling him what was wrong even if she could have found words for the wretchedness and confusion of her mind.

"There, there, my dear, dry your eyes. I shouldn't have been so short with you. I know you did your best this evening. Put my snappiness down to nerves and natural cussedness. After all it was a long session."

She allowed him his own interpretation of the tears. She regarded him bleakly, looking all at once so wan, so desolate, so pathetically young, that he said with bracing cheerfulness:

"I know you're worn to a frazzle, youngster. Maybe after the Blair tournament next week we can arrange for ten days at Palm Beach, or a cruise to Bermuda if you'd rather."

"Then, we're entering the tournament?"

"If Reuben Blair accepts our entry," Julian paused, said thoughtfully, "I don't suppose he will dare keep me out but he would if he could. That man hates me like slow poison. He's been hoping for years to catch me cheating some night."

"Why?"

"A matter of dollars and cents and pride, Patricia. The old fuddy-duddy owned the bridge racket in this town until my appearance on the scene. What a shock that was to Mr. Blair! Haverholt chuckled softly, continued, "Until I arrived Blair had the country fooled with bridge of the vintage of 1905. He handed down weekly pronouncements on the finer points of the game, he said thousands of books that could have been written by a child of three, his imbecilic magazine was bought by bridge players all over the world. Mr. Blair, in short, was the oracle of contract. It nearly broke his soft, sweet old heart to be shown up by a rank outsider, by someone not even mentioned in the social register. He had always believed that the game of bridge belonged to ladies and gentlemen."

"But, you are a gentleman," Patricia protested, not really interested.

"A highly debatable point," remarked Haverholt, grinning. "I'm afraid I'll always look like a species of secondhand to the boys who were born to high-hats and tail coats and long dull family trees. That suits me. I'm something that any of them would give their eye teeth to be—the greatest bridge player in the world, mademoiselle."

He bowed.

"Have you ever played against Blair?" asked Patricia, weary to death of his bragging.

"Never, and I never will so long as he is in his right mind. Blair very wisely gave up tournament bridge the year that I won the Eastern championship. Said the time had come to give the younger players a chance. There's a laugh for you, Patricia."

Patricia did not laugh. She hoped passionately that their entry in the coming tournament would not be accepted. Perhaps then she might have a breathing spell, might go on a cruise somewhere alone, might have an opportunity to win her way back to peace and sanity and clear thinking.

The following morning, Haverholt received in the mail a curt acceptance of the entry of himself and Patricia Haverholt in the Reuben Blair Cup Tournament. It was impossible for the girl to refuse to play. Haverholt had set his heart upon winning the cup from the hands of his bitter enemy. She could not let him down.

The night of Patricia's first public test found Julian Haverholt, usually so calm and controlled, in a state of extreme tension. In the first place he criticized her frock. Blue was an unlucky color; it made him nervous, always had.

"You're prettier in the gold, anyhow," he added defensively, conscious of her amusement.

"Isn't it bad luck to change?" queried Patricia innocently. "It might make me nervous to change."

"Do you think so?" he asked, instantly alert and troubled and serious. Then he saw she was laughing. He laughed too, termed himself a superstitious idiot, but nevertheless insisted upon the change.

"And, hurry, please, we must be there at eight-thirty promptly."

Presently, long before eight-thirty, Patricia drifted down the stairs, wearing the gold frock, long, tight fitting, infinitely becoming to her hair and skin. Haverholt eyed her proudly, contentedly.

"If they gave the cup on looks, Patricia, you'd win it hands down."

"Those are strong words, my friend," said the girl, dimpling.

"Not a bit too strong and you know it, you vain youngster," he returned, his dark, handsome face brightening.

All the way to the Hotel Winston he discussed bridge. This was her first tournament. She must remember that tournament play was different. No chances tonight, no grand slams, unless she held thirteen cards in the same suit and then she must try to get a double.

"Try to trap your opponents into a double whenever possible, Patricia. It may mean the difference between the high and average on a board."

"Must we get high on every board?" she asked, feeling a growing and responsive nervousness.

"By no means. Don't try any gambling bids tonight whatever you do. If we can get high on four boards and average on all the rest we'll be way ahead of the players who try to force their cards. There is little luck in duplicate, remember that."

She became more and more subdued. Haverholt had determined to win tonight. If he lost it would be her fault, hers alone.
