Dice of Asiatic Origin?
It is not known how and in what manner dice actually originated. Wherever dice have been found in the tombs of ancient Egypt, in Greece, or in the Far East, they differ in no material respect from those in use today. They were probably evolved from knuckle-bones. It is certain that dice games were played in times prior to those of which we have any written record. The fact that dice have been used throughout the Orient from time immemorial seems to indicate an Asiatic origin.

Pussy Cat's Back
A cat belonging to L. Quick, of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, was believed to have broken a leg, so it was decided to dispatch it. The cat was placed in a bag with a large stone, and the tied bag was dropped over the brink of a 123-foot water fall. When the executioners returned to Mr. Quick's house, there was the cat, seated on the porch, broken leg and all. No one knows what happened to the bag and the stone.

Shark's Companions
The largest non-eating sharks sometimes attain a length of 30 to 40 feet. It is not true that the female shark is blind. The pilot-fish, a member of the mackerel family and only about 12 inches long, accompanies ships and also sharks, guiding the sharks to their food. It swims close in front of the shark, but probably does this to feed on fragments scattered by the shark and also to secure protection from its voracity.

LAGUARDIA TO 'CLEAN HOUSE' through rare. I have a job for you," he told commissioner of accounts Paul Blanshard while giving him the oath.

To corporation counsel Paul Windels he said: "I don't care whether the law department is the biggest office in the world. I want it to be the best."

Similar greetings and admonitions were meted out to correction commissioner Austin H. McCormick, dock commissioner John McKenzie, one of the few Tammany holdovers, and public welfare commissioner William Hodson.

"There's something wrong with the tax department, but I don't know what it is," he told commissioner of taxes and assessments Dominick Trotta. "See if you can find out."

Later in the day he smashed tradition by appearing before the Tammany controlled board of aldermen to plead for support in effecting his economic reforms.

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

With the others she went out to the car. She felt queer, not herself. Clark was driving. He and Marthe had the front seat. Julian and Phil were with Patricia in the back. Patricia listened to Phil's naive exposition of the Sky High club, nodded occasionally, spoke when it was her turn. The club was supposed to be owned by a gangster, so Phil said; it was constantly under police supervision, but somehow kept on running.

"It's my personal belief that all the gangsters have gone on the stage," said Haverholt, grinning. "I'd like to meet a dyed-in-the-wool racketeer just once. What's that, Clark?" he called, for the man in the front seat had muttered something.

Marthe turned. "Clark just said," she announced, laughing, "Clark said that a bridge expert didn't need to meet a racketeer."

"I said no such thing!"
"Yes, you did, darling."
"I didn't."

The two in the front seat wrangled all the way to the club. Julian had not minded, he had, in fact, been rather flattered. But Patricia knew that Marthe was trying to stir up trouble between the two men.

The Sky High club was on a mean, quiet little street, given over in daytimes to business. The building was formidable, a ten-story loft building, dark now. A man who had been strolling up and down the sidewalk came up alertly as their car stopped. Clark showed his card.

A door was unlocked. The five streamed into a dimly lighted, bare, uncarpeted hall.

"I'm thrilled," whispered Marthe. "They were lifted to the roof in a freight elevator. Marthe liked that too. Clark and Phil were curious. He admired this approach, rather. Good stuff for people who lived on Park Avenue. It made them feel that they were slumming. They reached the roof. Julian was not surprised by the club. The others were. The club was all that its name had indicated. Sky High. It was luxurious, it was smart, it was modern, it was done in silver gray. There was a gleaming onyx bar. It was just another night club.

"Well," said Marthe, disappointed. "Is this it?"

"What did you expect?" inquired Clark, not quite pleasantly. "Machine guns at the door?"

"Just for that I'll dance first with Julian."

"You would have anyhow," Clark said in a voice pitched for her ears alone. Marthe pretended not to hear. She linked her arm defiantly through Julian's, strolled with him to a pocket-handkerchief floor where three other couples were revolving slowly.

That left Patricia with Clark and Phil. The two men looked at each other. Phil sighed and took a seat at the bar. Patricia stepped into Clark's embrace and drifted into a world of pure enchantment. She forgot her worries, her anxieties, her reasons for coming here, her reasons for desiring not to come.

Let the future take care of itself while she waltzed with Clark! "There are tables outside," he said, looking down into her flushed and beautiful face. "Why don't we go outside?"

"Don't you like this?"

"I never see you alone," he said. Beneath his breath he said, "Can't I ever see you alone?"

The music sobbed to a close and they started for a door that led to the cool of the roof. Three men were coming in from the hall; three men were dropping their hats and coats; three men were preparing to stop at the bar.

Three men were coming in from the hall. Patricia saw only one. That one was Bill McGee.

Patricia saw only one. That one was Bill McGee.

Patricia felt the pulses roaring in her ears. She thought for a moment that she would faint, that she must faint. She leaned against Clark, her whole body suddenly stricken. Had Bill seen her? Or hadn't he seen her? He was giving his hat to the check-girl. He would turn in a moment. He would see her then!

She darted through the open door to the roof. Clark, bewildered, followed swiftly. What was wrong? What had happened? The girl had backed against the edge of the roof, her eyes terrified in an ashen face. Just a minute before she had been smiling, delighting him with her gaiety. He could not understand.

"What is it?" asked Clark aloud. "There's a man inside," she stammered in a voice that rang with fear. "He's at the bar now. He mustn't see me. I can't let him see me."

At once she steadied. She had said too much. She knew it. She was conscious of Clark's bewilderment, conscious of the need for courage and absolute control. Clark was full of a thousand questions. Man-like, he wanted to take up her battle. But he wanted to know why.

"I don't want you to do anything," she told him frantically. "I only want to leave. I must leave."

"But Patricia—"

"Get me out," she said pitifully, as a child might say it. "Please get me out. I've got to get out."

People were strolling on the roof, were sitting at little softly lighted tables, were admiring a swimming pool that no one had the audacity to use. At any moment Bill might appear for a breath of air. She was not safe here, not safe anywhere here.

Clark reached an instant decision. "Very well," he said briefly. "I'll take you."

Principals in U. S.-Clearing House Suit

A few of the principals in the unprecedented suit the U. S. Government has filed in New York State court to compel the twenty banks comprising the New York Clearing House Association to live up to an agreement that they would guarantee in full deposits of the defunct Harriman bank, whose form and agreement was filed in full by the government, James F. T. O'Connor, Federal Controller of Currency, filed the suit on behalf of the government, and in the complaint are eight bankers who comprised the clearing house committee which made the agreement. Among them are Charles S. McCain, chairman, Chase National; George W. Davidson, Central Hanover and Trust Co.; Percy H. Johnston, president, Chemical National and Trust Co.; and Mortimer N. Buckner, chairman, New York Trust Co. Should the Government win its action 11,000 in the defunct bank would receive $9,375,000.
