"TAKE THIS WOMAN"

By Allene Corliss

SYNOPSIS

After three years' travel in Europe, where she had gone following her father's death, young and beautiful Stanley Paige became bored and returned to New York to find the "something sort of sweet and important" which she felt was missing. Stanley finds Perry Deverest, handsome young lawyer, still as much in love with her as ever, but her own heart is untouched. She longs for someone to love—someone to really belong to. Then she meets the fascinating Drew, Armitage. It is love at sight. Drew's most recent heart had been sophisticated Dennis St. John. In breaking with her, he said: "You know, Dennis, you're a lot like me—you know when a thing is ended and you accept it—gracefully." Ned Wingate informs Stanley that the latter's lawyer, Charles Carleton, has been playing the market heavily and wonders if her funds are intact. Knowing that love to Stanley means marriage, Drew casually proposes. Realizing her extreme innocence, he regrets his flirtatious past. Drew admits to Dennis that, although he is not marrying Stanley for her money, if she were poor he would have loved her just the same but . . . he would have the good sense to stay away from her. Then comes the crash and Stanley's fortune is lost. As long as she has Drew, the loss of the money means nothing to Stanley.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

As soon as Ned left her, she telephoned him. "I know," he told her over the wire. "I've just come from Wingate's office. I'm on my way uptown now. I'll be with you in ten minutes."

Stanley admitted him herself. Felt the same surge of ecstasy she always experienced when they met again after a separation, however brief.

He flung his hat and gloves onto a table, went by her into the drawing room. She followed him, her eyes surprised. "Aren't you going to kiss me, Drew?" "He laughed shortly. "Of course I am."

He kissed her, briefly, emotionlessly. Turned away from her almost immediately. "Gosh, Stanley, I'm sorry for you! I went over to Wingate's office as soon as I saw the morning papers. It looks as if you were cleaned out—Carleton must have been crazy to have plunged like that. It was criminal!"

Stanley watched him light a cigarette. Noticed that his hands were unsteady. She felt suddenly very sorry for him. It was nice of him to care like that—but unnecessary. She must make him understand that she didn't really mind about the money.

She said, looking at him gravely, her chin lifted a bit. "I don't really mind—but about the money. Don't you realize that nothing matters to me any more—that nothing can hurt me—except you?"

Drew dragged his eyes from her, sat down abruptly on a divan. When he spoke his voice was even, emotionless. "You don't make it very easy for me, Stanley, do you? In fact, you make it darned hard. I don't suppose it has occurred to you, that this might affect—us?" Stanley stood quite still, her eyes frozen on his averted face. After a long while she said, her voice choked and dragging: "Yes, I thought it would. I thought we could be married right away—with out any tiresome formalities. I was glad of it."

He looked up at her, his mouth twisted into a grim smile. "Yes? And just what did you think we'd live on—love? Good heavens, Stanley, be reasonable! I can't support you—I can barely support myself!"

Quite without warning he reached out and put his arms about her.

There was a great bowl of golden roses on the piano. Drew had sent them that morning. Stanley, staring at them, saw them grow until they seemed to fill the whole room, until they seemed to be choking her, smothering her in their pervasive, golden fragrance. She reached out her hands to push them away and as she did so, she heard some one moan. It was a piteous little moan—the sort a small animal might make if fatally wounded. A second later she realized in some vague way that it had escaped her own lips. She dragged her eyes away from the roses—looked at Drew. She saw him quite clearly. More clearly than she had ever seen him before. He was lighting another cigarette.

She wanted to scream or to laugh long and foolishly. She did neither. She simply sat down in a high-backed chair and continued to stare at him. She thought he looked very unhappy, very miserable; like a handsome child who had been terribly disappointed and was taking it badly. Then she saw that he was talking and that she must try to listen to what he was saying.

"Won't you try to be sensible about this, Stanley?" he was appealing to her ruthlessly, his voice sharp, almost brittle with nervousness. "You're like all people who have always had money—it doesn't mean anything to you—it isn't important. Won't you try to understand that that's where you're quite wrong? It is important—it's as important as the deuce!"

"More important than—love, Drew?" She had spoken quite involuntarily. She felt shocked, shaken, at the sound of her own voice in that quiet room. "Very important to love, Stanley. You must see that. Some way I've got to make you see that."

He flung up his head, stared at her with tormented eyes. "Can't you see what has happened to us, Stanley—can't you see?"

"Drew, are you trying to tell me that because I no longer have a lot of money, you no longer want to marry me?" This time Stanley asked the clear, even sound of her voice quite calmly; was merely a little awed by the ease with which she could control it
