Time Extended On
Tobacco Contracts

Lafayette, Ind., Feb. 7.—(U.P.)— Indiana burley tobacco growers will have until Feb. 17 to sign contracts and obtain reduction payments under the agricultural adjustment plan Purdue University officials were advised today by J. B. Hutson, chief of the tobacco section of the AAA.

The time was extended from Feb.
10 at the request of officials in charge of the campaign.

It is believed that 95 per cent of the burley tobacco growers will sign the reduction contracts.

SYNOPSIS

Lovely Stanley Paige could have married any eligible man in her set—there was, for instance, the young lawyer, Perry Deverest, loyal and reliable; but she fell in love with dashing, irresponsible Drew Armitage. Drew told Dennis St. John, his former sweetheart, that although he would have loved Stanley under any circumstances, he would never have become engaged to her had she been poor.
Then comes the crash and Stanley's fortune is wiped out. She does not care as long as she has Drew's love, but... he says it would be madness to marry on his income. So with a dramatic... "Stanley, I shall never forget you and I shall always regret having hurt you—but never having loved you," he passes out of her life. Though broken-hearted, Stanley accepts the blow stoically. Anxious to be alone she goes for a ride.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Three hours later, she was at home. She went straight to her room and rang for Ellen. "I've ruined everything out, Ellen," she said, flinging off her tight little hat, kicking off her slim pumps. "As soon as I've had a bath I'll tell you exactly what I'm going to do."
"It's like this," she continued, emerging from the black and rose fragrance of the bathroom, her slim body wrapped in orchid chif-fon, her eyes and voice steady and cool, "I've gone over everything carefully and I've arrived at certain conclusions. It wasn't very hard to do." She flicked Ellen an ironical little smile. Listened to me quietly and don't interrupt—you'll want to but it won't do any good because I'm quite determined." She sat down in a chair, crossed her slim legs and went on evenly. "The money's gone—there doesn't seem to be much doubt about that. Charles Carleton's gone—I wish that might have been prevented.
Drew's gone—we'll leave him out of it. Well, I'm going too—I'm getting out. I could delay any drastic change indefinitely; you know how it's done, by visiting around, letting my friends carry me along.
They'd do quite a lot, of course.
Marcia and Ned would do a lot. So would Perry Deverest. I could wire Perry to come back from Canada.
Perry wouldn't mind about the money, wouldn't even mind my not being in love with him. I could go back to Aunt Julie, who would find it terribly hard supporting two on her own small income after having the use of my big one. She would hate having to do it but not so much as I would hate doing it. So there you are. I can't go back, I can't accept charity, and I can't marry Perry.
So I'm getting out." Her voice became quietly abrupt. "You've saved some money, haven't you, Ellen—enough for yourself?"

"Enough for both of us, Miss Stanley," Ellen's eyes behind their silver-rimmed glasses were misty.
Her voice trembled with eagerness.
Stanley shook her head. "No.
This time, Ellen, you're not going with me. You're going over to Newark with your sister. She'll be glad to have you—you can help her with her shop. I'm stepping out—alone."

Utter consternation blinded Ellen's blue eyes. "But, Miss Stanley, dear, you can't do that, it isn't fair! After all these years—I can't leave you like that—you can't ask me to!"

"But I am asking you to, Ellen, and because you've never refused me anything, you'll do as I ask now. I've got to get away from everything. Don't you see, Ellen—don't you understand? I've got to fight and struggle and—and be born again! It's the only way I can go on, the only way I can stick it!
Can't you see that it is, Ellen?"

Ellen nodded gravely, tears running down her flushed cheeks, splashing onto the black silk of her gown. "Perhaps you're right, Miss Stanley. Perhaps this is something I can't do for you. But remember "Sure I can take you to a cheap hotel—New York is thick with 'em."

"I'll always be there if you need me.
I'll come to you at any time, anywhere."
"I know you will, Ellen. And it will help, knowing that. And now," Stanley thrust the emotion out of her voice, spoke quietly, "we'd better go over the household accounts."

Stanley was the last to leave the apartment. All of her huge wardrobe of frocks and wraps and slender slippers and daring little hats had been disposed of, sold at a ridiculously low figure to a dealer in such things. There had been a girl in Vienna, who was always going broke and having to sell her clothes. Stanley had remembered her. She had saved only a few necessary things; a tweed coat, a close dark hat, lingerie and a pair of tall, mahogany pumps, a slim tan frook.

She had been cool and business-like about it all. It was Ellen who had wept softly at seeing all the lovely things depart in the possession of a fat and perspiring Jew.
Stanley honestly felt no regret.
They, the bits of moonlight wisps of rainbow that were her gowns, the soft velvets and drifting chiffons that were her evening wraps, belonged to a girl who was leaving behind—a girl who had lived in a fool's paradise. And now she was leaving both the girl and the paradise behind and going on—alone.

She would have no need of these things. She rather thought that she was done forever with moonlight and rainbows and all the other dear, frail, delightful things that make life an illusion and a tragedy.

She had watched Ellen depart with her trunk, in a taxi, for Newark. Had wanted to rush down the steps and shriek at her to come back, or better yet, to take her along. But she had done neither.
Had stood, instead, straight and slim, in a high drawing room window and waved her handkerchief, until the taxi and Ellen's tear-stained face had vanished around the corner.

Now she was quite alone. Behind her, the apartment was strangely, emptily still. Flowers and cigarettes and books had disappeared. The furniture stood shrouded in white sheets, the piano was closed, the hearth swept clean.
She moved away from the high window and stood in the middle of the long, quiet room, in the hot, dusk of the late afternoon. She twisted her fingers together tightly and said, in a rough, choked little whisper, "Good-bye, lovely room, good-bye, lovely love—I'm taking the memory of you both away with me—it's bitter-sweet and it hurts, but it's going with me, wherever I go, whatever I do."

...

The taxi-driver grinned good-naturedly. "Sure I can take you to a cheap hotel—New York is thick with 'em—but why not try a rooming-house? They're less money and just as clean."

"Do you know of one? Say, lady, what I don't know about roominghouses!" He looked at her appraisingly. "Get in and we'll try Mrs.
Foley's—I took a girl there a couple of nights ago—she'd been living in a swell dump on the Drive but something happened to her income and she had to clear out."

Stanley said, "I see," and smiled wearily and climbed into the cab.
She leaned her head back against its hot leather cushions and closed her eyes. She wondered if she would come to know the girl who had lived in "the swell dump on the Drive."

The cab stopped with a jerk before a house—a house that was only one of a long street of narrow old houses, all hopelessly shabby, all hopelessly beaten. But the woman who opened the door was clean and efficient looking. She took in Stanley swiftly with one quick comprehensive glance. "I've only got one room vacant; it's small and not any too cool but it might do, miss, but if it's a place to live cheap you're looking for, you'd better look at it."

"I'm sure it will do very well," Stanley smiled at the woman and paid the friendly taxi-driver, tipping him generously. He looked at the tip, hesitated, and handed her back half a dollar.

"You may be needing it, yourself!" he told her with a grin and went back to his cab. He'd make it up on a gentleman drunk and the kid had looked sort of young and scared. He wondered what it was all about—he'd picked her up at a good address on Park Avenue and left her here. Oh, well, it was all in a day's work. He'd seen queerer things than that: once a girl had committed suicide in his cab and once a woman had paid her fare with a diamond earring.
