Samuel Insull Will Be Examined Again

Athens, Mar. 6.—(U.P.)—Samuel Insull won a respite today from an expulsion order and will be re-examined by specialists to determine his fitness for travel.

Insull, aged Chicago utilities magnate facing trial in Federal court if the United States can extradite him, suffered a heart and nervous collapse when a police official visited him to extend his stay two days and gave him Greek traveling papers.

On the advice of his lawyer, Insull asked for a re-examination as to his fitness to travel and Minister of Interior John Rallis appointed Prof. Bennis and Livierator of the university to make the examination.

State Police Buy Eighteen New Cars

Indianapolis, Mar. 6.—(U.P.)—Motorization of the entire Indiana state police force neared completion today as Al G. Feeney, director of the state safety department, was given authority to purchase 18 new machines.

Feeney said he planned to equip all sergeants first and then distribute the remaining cars among patrolmen. He said the department would have 38 cars when the new lot arrives. The department has 58 men.

Feeney said on the present basis by which patrolmen use their own cars, being paid at the rate of five cents per mile, the new cars would pay for themselves in 90 days.

Making a Garden on Clay

Contrary to the opinion of many, clay soil is not the worst kind of base for a garden, although it causes difficulties if not properly treated. In its natural state it cuts like soap when wet, and bakes like brick when dry, but these two extremes can be easily modified with a little inexpensive care. In many ways it is superior to a sandy, or gravelly soil, because it can be built into something more desirable with less expense.

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

Nevertheless, he gave something to John Harmon, satisfied some inner craving, quieted some restless uncertainty within him. When days came, as they always did, and words lost their magic and became a mere disconnected scrawl—when those other days came and they seemed possessed of the devil and threatened to carry him away with them into dangerous irrelevance—then he sought the bookshop and found there what he needed—a return of courage and inspiration; or a sense of restraint and stability, as the case might be.

Stanley liked to have him come, liked to know that while she was busy with customers, wrapping up books, he was there in the back, talking with Felix Rose. She felt that once again, in some intangible way, she had given him something as, indeed, she had.

Coming home together in the late dusk, they would usually find Perry or Nigel Stern or Dennis St. John, or more often all three, waiting for them in the room on East Ninth Street. Then there would be food and cigarettes and an hour of delicious talk and relaxation, before the steady warmth of John Harmon's fire.

They discussed everything except the new Gloria. John Harmon had even refused to read a line of that to Stanley.

"It's like beginning all over again," he confessed to them soberly, "and I'm as nervous as hades about anyone seeing it. It may be quite awful, you know. If it is, Dennis will be to blame."

"I don't mind in the least," she would retort languidly, "it can't be as awful as the other was futile."

But as a matter of fact the novel that was taking shape slowly but surely under John Harmon's freshly purged inspiration was neither awful nor futile. It was good and in his innermost heart John Harmon knew that this was so; but he had suffered and he no longer took things for granted. He wrote carefully and with a great deal of humility and with a real fear of the too-easy phrase, the too-facile thought. He was doing with surface finish—he was plunging into bedrock. He was striking his roots deep this time—that they might bring forth enduring results.

And then one rainy afternoon when Nigel and Dennis had gone to an exhibition at the Anderson Galleries and Perry was out of town and John Harmon was shut up in his study, struggling over a stubborn chapter, Marcia and Gerda Lessing came to call.

Stanley had come home early from the shop with a headache and was poking in the medicine box for some aspirin when Marcia's long, beige car drew up in front of the house and Marcia herself rang the bell. There was nothing to do but stop looking and powder her nose and say "Darn" and go out to greet them.

Having done this most enthusiastically, she put more wood on the fire, boiled water for tea and set out the shallow pink cups and the pewter teapot.

Marcia looked about her, frankly curious. She had not come entirely for tea or to see Stanley. She could have tea at any number of amusing places and she saw Stanley quite often now at Nigel Stern's or going see how Stanley lived, to renew an about with Perry; she had come to old intimacy and to tell her something. Stanley married to John Harmon Northrup was not as socially interesting as Stanley married to Perry Deverest would have been. But there was no escaping the fact that she was much more interesting than Stanley not married to John Harmon, and living in a rooming-house working for her living, could ever possibly have been.

John Harmon had possibilities. He was an author—new but promising. Nigel Stern was interested in him. They said that Maynard, editor of the Review, was interested in him. He had written some clever stories that had been talked about. He was writing a novel—it might be a best-seller. If it was, John Harmon was in a good way of becoming a personality. Personalities were at a premium in Marcia's set. She had no intention of letting one slip through her fingers.

Then there was a very natural curiosity to see exactly how Stanley managed to exist on almost no money at all. Marcia wanted to see just how it was done and just how dreadful it must be, so that she could go home and sigh about it a bit. Marcia wasn't really honest, she was just rather more honest, and less naturally hypocritical, than most people.

And then there was this matter of Drew's engagement. Of course, Stanley might know about it already, but on the other hand—

Well, anyway, Marcia had called up Gerda Lessing and they had come to call on Stanley and now they were having tea in front of her fire and exclaiming over the pewter teapot and the primroses and the Governor Winthrop desk.

"I suppose this is just the sort of thing that would happen to you," Marcia was saying to Stanley, stirring her tea in its shallow pink cup. "You've never done things like anyone else and apparently being poor is no exception. You've never been like the rest of us. If one didn't like you so well, it might be annoying. So much has happened to you since we were in school, those years abroad, meeting all kinds of interesting people, and now—a clever husband and this unusual way of living."

"Don't you ever miss the other sort of thing, though?" asked Gerda smoothly, in her sleek, cool voice. "Don't you get bored with being poor?"

"I miss not having lots of clothes and plenty of hot water and breakfast in bed," admitted Stanley, passing Marcia the tea. "But that's so little compared with what I don't miss. I was much more bored with being rich—and forever following at Aunt Julie's heels."

"I understand that she's made a very good marriage," offered Marcia. "Yes, she wrote me that she had—suggested I might have done as well if I had used better judgment."

"She would. Well, she's always been fortunate in finding someone to support her."

"My dear, she's made a business of it!" Gerda interpolated quickly. "All the same, Stanley, I don't see how you had the courage to run away and be actually poor—I'm quite sure I should have followed your Aunt Julie's advice and married the most convenient bank account within reach. You could have so easily!"

"Meaning Perry, I suppose?" "Well, yes, if you will be per-manner will result in an excellent garden bed.

If the gardener cannot treat his entire area the first year, he may take a section at a time. He may also sow a crop of clover, which he can spade into the soil, repeating the process on a different spot the following year. This adds nitrogen and humus to the clay.

There is lots of plant food in clay soil if the roots of the plants can work themselves into it.

FLOOD DANGER MENACES EAST

Swollen Lakes and Rivers Threaten East; Three Children Drown

(By the United Press)

Swollen lakes and rivers, aftermath of last week's blizzard and this week's thaw, endangered eastern towns and cities today and threatened to tie up highway transportation and industry.

Three small children were drowned in Connecticut when they fell into swift streams in various sections of the state. Highway traffic between Pittsburgh, Mass., and Albany, N. Y., was suspended as four feet of water overflowed the roadway. Lowlands of river villages in the vicinity of Albany were inundated as the Hudson rose an estimated foot an hour during the morning. A barricade of ice extending from Troy to the New York state capital crushed numerous small boats and boat houses along the shore.

Recession of the Raritan river near New Brunswick, N. J., permitted several hundred families to return to homes abandoned yesterday when the water flooded the city's industrial section. Dynamiting crews labored all day to break the ice jams.

High waters of the Susquehanna river carried away the middle span of a bridge connecting Susquehanna and Oakland, Pa. A bridge at Parker City, Pa., was closed when ice jams in the Allegheny river threatened security of its piers.

COURT RULING IS HAILED AS NEW DEAL AID

Reynolds, George Sutherland and Pierce Butler.

For Leo Nebbia, the Rochester, N. Y., cut price grocer, convicted of giving a loaf of bread with two nine-cent quarts of milk, McReynolds, said:

"He was convicted of a crime for selling his own property—wholesome milk—at a price satisfactory to himself and the customers."

But, the majority opinion noted, "the production and distribution of milk is a paramount industry of the state, and largely affects the health and prosperity of its people."

Roberts noted that in New York

price wars forced the state to establish regulations.

This, he said, raised the question whether Nebbia had been denied protection of the 14th amendment's due process clause.

The dissenting opinion held that it did.

"But," Robert's opinion argued, "neither property rights nor contract rights are absolute; for the government cannot exist if citizen may at will use his property to the detriment of his laws or exercise his freedom of contract to work them harm."
