CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

Stanley poked up the fire and put away the tea things. She laid the chops for dinner in their pan and put two potatoes over the flame to boil and prepared a salad. In the next room, now that Marcia and Gerda were gone, she could hear the steady clack of John Harmon's typewriter.

She had had a bad fifteen minutes, but now that she was alone she found that she was oddly, coldly detached. Her hands did things mechanically. Her mind worked in much the same way.

Drew was engaged... Drew was going to be married... in June... to a girl named Janet... That ought to end everything, settle the whole foolish situation once and for all—but it didn't. Any more than her marrying John Harmon had ended everything—settled anything. This feeling that she had for Drew was something between Drew and herself which nothing else could possibly alter or affect. There had been a time when she had felt that this wasn't so, when she had thought that surely the love she had for John Harmon must completely destroy the desire that she had for Drew. She had clung to this belief pathetically and now she relinquished it with a dumb sort of pain—but relinquish it she did, for she knew now, when she faced the fact of his marriage, that nothing was changed, that nothing—not John Harmon, nor the girl in Chicago, nor Drew's utter and unbroken silence—could alter the feeling which at the mere mention of his name possessed her.

Suddenly she felt tired and horribly lonely. She knew a great desire to go to John Harmon; to tell him everything, find solace and comfort and forgetfulness in the pressure of his steady arms, blot out the memory of Drew's hot, demanding kisses with the sweetness of John Harmon's tender ones; and thus in abandoning herself to the gentleness of John Harmon's love gain release from that other, and less worthy emotion.

She crossed the room and threw open the door to the study. John Harmon was bent over his typewriter, his hair rumpled, his eyes tired, but his smile, weary though it was, was full of welcome.

"Hello, Stan. What the devil's the matter? You look completely fagged—those women too much for you?"

Looking at him sitting there, worn and unmistakably fagged himself, Stanley knew suddenly that she was not going to tell him anything—not now, at least, when he was so obviously in need of rest and food and relaxation himself.

"Just about—and you've worked quite long enough for one day. How's it going?" She motioned to the pile of manuscript he had piled up since lunch.

"It's going fine," John Harmon sat back in his chair and ran his fingers through his hair, his eyes shining through their fatigue. "I've caught something this time. Stanley, something real and warm and pulsing. It's the sort of thing I used to dream about doing—and then deserted for the other, you know, the clever situation, the amusing phrase. That sort of thing—I can't get away from it entirely—I'm not sure I want to—but it's relegated to where it belongs. It's no longer the end and aim of my writing. My people are real this time, Stan, they sacrifice a lot in cleverness, a lot in brilliance—but they're human, human 'way through."

"I'm glad, John Harmon, glad Dennis was right, glad she had the courage to tell you, glad you had the courage to find yourself again. Life isn't always as simple as that."

She turned abruptly and went back to her gas plate, tying an apron over her blue frock.

John Harmon drew a hand across rather puzzled brown eyes—Stanley had sounded a bit fed up with things, a bit cynical, unlike herself. Had those women been disagreeable, made her restless, dissatisfied? But that wasn't fair to Stanley, to her good sense, her beautiful loyalty. He washed his hands, brushed his hair and went out to help her get the supper.

"I don't want Drew, darling, I want you. Will you believe that, John Harmon—always?"

Stanley was turning the chops in their iron pan, her back to him.

"Shall I fix the coffee?" he asked, with a rather apparent attempt at cheerfulness.

"If you want to." He did so, wishing it required more effort. He felt awkward, helpless in the face of Stanley's continued silence. "Let's leave the dishes and go to a movie," he suggested with a simulated eagerness, rearranging an already perfectly set table.

"You know I don't like to leave the dishes, and anyway we can't afford movies twice a week—we've been once already."

"Well, I guess it won't break us to go again. Or perhaps you'd like to take a walk—it's going to be a grand night for walking."

Stanley transferred the chops to a small platter, took up the potatoes and turned to the ice-box for the salads.

"Can't I help you?" John Harmon stood just behind her, anxious-eyed, wondering what it was all about.

Slowly Stanley swung around and faced him. "I don't know whether you can or not, Drew is being married—in June."

She looked away swiftly, hating herself for having hurt him like that! Hating him for letting her see that she had.

"Oh," he said slowly, his hands slipping away from where they had been resting lightly on her shoulders. "Drew, I'm afraid I'd nearly forgotten about—Drew, Stanley."

"I thought I had too—and now I find I haven't. I don't suppose I should have told you. John Harmon, a wife isn't supposed to tell her husband that she is—upset because a former lover is getting himself married."

Stanley's voice broke on a high, thin note; for a horrifying moment she thought she was going to cry, or laugh foolishly, but she didn't, because John Harmon put his arms about her suddenly and held her fiercely to his heart.

"Don't talk about it any more—not right now anyway. And I'm glad you told me, darling."

He picked her up abruptly and carried her to the wing chair and sat down with her still in his arms.

After a long while, Stanley's arms crept up and drew his face down to hers. "You're precious, John Harmon, precious. And I'm a beast to hurt you so. I don't want Drew, darling, I want you. Will you believe that, John Harmon—always?"

"I will if you want me to," he told her and kissed her quickly before she should see the betraying wistfulness in his eyes.

A young and dancing April tripped in on the heels of an old and wind-blown March and the city awakened from its winter's lethargy, shook off its old clothes, and stepped forth clad scantily but delightfully in the pale green of bursting buds and the pale gold of spring sunlight.

Yellow crocuses thrust themselves into a fragrant beauty in the parks and violet petunias bloomed suddenly in window-boxes and pink geraniums were ranged in neat rows, like vegetables, in front of florists' shops. The shop windows were a splash of the certain shade of blue that was new that season and skirts were definitely long and waist lines had come to stay.

Stanley bought a new spring coat and an intriguing little violet hat and set her primroses in the open windows and thrilled to the whole gloriously refreshing phenomenon of seeing and feeling an old world made new again.

Since the afternoon of Marcia's visit she had put Drew and his engagement resolutely out of her mind. She felt very close to John Harmon these days; close to him with a sort of childlike faith that he found heartbreakingly sweet. He knew, though she never spoke of Drew's engagement again, how much she had suffered; what he suffered himself he characteristically discounted as unimportant; where Stanley's unhappiness was concerned there could be no question of his own—he had put her first too long for it ever to be otherwise, but out of the tangle of their mutual unhappiness they had somehow, quite without spoken explanations, found understanding. They were, perhaps, closer to each other than they had ever been—being together by an intangible need of each other which grew stronger from day to day.

Some Uncommon Vegetables

If the home vegetable plot is limited to the things one would buy in the market only half its possibilities are realized. The greatest fun comes in growing vegetables new to you.

For example, there is cervil, which resembles parsley, but is thought by many superior in flavor. Upland cress and corn salad are appetizing additions to the salad list. Hamburg rooted parsley is a delicious ingredient of stews. Celerae, or rooted celery is a winter keeper, which, when cooked and served in salads, imparts a delicious celery flavor.

Pop corn is as easy to grow as sweet corn. The new South American variety is most popular just now. Horseradish sets will grow a crop of roots which can be ground up as needed next winter. Tarragon plants will provide a crop of leaves which will transform vinegar in which they are steeped.

Leeks are cousins to the onion, but more highly esteemed for cooking. Okra can be grown in northern as well as southern gardens and is delicious in soups. Bermuda onions can be grown to a fair size from plant which are started in Texas and shipped north.

Edible pod peas, which are cooked like stringless beans, are worth trying. Mammoth pod sugar grows pods five inches long. The French like them. Small fruited tomatoes, resembling in shape grapes, currants, cherries, peaches, plums and pears, may be grown to decorate salads or to make preserves.

These are a few of the unusual vegetables which are possible to the home garden, and the list could be doubled by including the many cooking herbs which our grandmothers knew how to use.

Good seed comes from good seedsmen. It will pay you to be discriminating when you select your dealer.

Get the stakes ready for the tomato plants, and poles for the beans. Try pole lima beans this year. You will find they give twice the yield of bush sorts.

Furnish your flower garden like you would your home. After all, it is your outdoor living room for the summer season, and should be as beautiful and comfortable as indoors.

A cool room or a cold frame is the best place to start snapdragon seed. They make up for their slow beginning when they get into the garden.

Growing dahlias from seed is an exciting adventure. Sow in a hotbed in March, and transplant later for August and September blooms. You may produce a valuable new variety.

Penny Brought Fire Engines

Hartford, Conn.—(U.P.)—A 10-year-old boy dropped a penny in a fire alarm box to get a stick of candy and four pieces of fire apparatus responded. After being lectured, the frightened lad was sent home.

Husband and Wife Pastors

Orrick, Mo.—(U.P.)—A husband and wife have been chosen as joint pastors at the Union Baptist Church here. It is the first time in church history that a wife has shared the pulpit with her husband in this section.

Get the Habit—Trade at Home

Are You A Carbohydrate Drunk?

In other words, are you overweight? To eat inordinate breads, pastries or candies is truly going on a drunk—a carbohydrate drunk. An excess of sugars and starches becomes poison to the body, which it digests them, must store them as fat. Fat taxes the heart and kidneys and shortens life. Obesity is a dangerous condition than underweight, for the fat individual is a burden that gives him nothing in return, while the one who underweight has at least the greater freedom of action because of his lightness.

Our Washington Bureau has ready a bulletin on Weight reduction, prepared by a physician, which gives directions that if fully followed, will bring desired results.

If you are overweight and wish to reduce, fill out the coupon below and send for this bulletin:
