Detroit Company Workers Strike

Detroit, Mar. 20—(U.P.)—Approximately 750 employees of the Bowler Roller Bearing company struck today, virtually tying up production.

The strike, under sponsorship of the American Federation of Labor, was viewed as evidence of the labor unrest which is threatening a nationwide strike in the automobile industry.

The strike was voted last night, while the Detroit regional labor board was planning a hearing on union demands to settle charges of alleged discrimination against union employees. The strikers charge the company dismissed several women because of their organization activity. The company employs about 1,000 men and women. Its products are sold to automobile companies.

"Do you mind, Perry?" she had asked him the night before. "I'd so much rather see him, first—alone."

And Perry had told her: "No, I don't mind at all—but promise me you'll be sensible."

She had smiled at him, a gravely unwearying little smile. "I'll be the only way I can be, Perry. I'm not good at dissembling, it just isn't my way, that's all."

And he had had to be content with that and meet John Harmon's boat.

And now John Harmon, his face white with disappointment and nervous with apprehension, was closing tense fingers about his arm and demanding: "Where is Stanley, Perry? Why isn't she here?"

"She's quite all right, old man, and crazy to see you. But the heat, you know—and I expect she preferred having you to herself, rather than sharing you with this crowd."

John Harmon's grip relaxed, he laughed apologetically. "Of course. Crazy of me to have been so darned upset. How is she anyway, Perry?"

"Fine. You're looking pretty fit yourself—have a great trip?"

"Great. It would have been wonderful if Stanley had been along—I missed her like the devil. I know, Perry, about three weeks ago I came near ditching Maynard and turning around and beating it home? We were in Rome and I had the queerest feeling—that something was wrong, you know—one night, I lay awake for hours struggling against this feeling that something was happening to Stanley—to us, if you see what I mean. I thought I'd be all right in the morning—but I wasn't. But that night I slept all right and after that everything was okay again. Funny, wasn't it?" He looked at Perry inquiringly from beneath the brim of his hat, laughed briefly. "Just shows how a man's imagination will get the better of his common sense, doesn't it?"

"Yes," agreed Perry evenly, guiding his car through heavy traffic, "it certainly does."

Stanley stood at one of the front windows and saw the car drive up, saw John Harmon gather up his bags and leap out, saw Perry drive away, saw John Harmon run up the steps, two at a time.

She turned then and went to meet him. But she had only gone a few steps when he flung the door open and then closed it again, softly, behind him.

"Darling!" He held her tightly, his arms hard and punishing about her slim shoulders. For a moment they stood like this, then he put her away from him, laughed down at her with eyes that were a little frightened, a little pleading. "Don't cry like that, Stanley, it's not good for you. Besides, there's nothing to cry about, precious!"

"I know, I'm an awful little fool, John Harmon. I ought to be gay and beautiful—and excited! And instead of that, I'm all damp and smeared with tears and lip-stick! I'm all right, now, though—truly, I am." She smiled at him, lifting her chin gallantly.

John Harmon looked away swiftly. Suddenly, for some reason which he couldn't explain at all, he felt like crying too. And all the time she was thinking: "I've got to tell him, some time before tonight, I've got to tell him—about the baby—about Drew. And I want to tell him about the baby but it will be hard telling him about Drew."

Yet she knew she would do it. Must do it. She meant to do it first. All her life she had done disagreeable things first. Saved all the nice things until last. It made doing the disagreeable things easier, knowing the nice things were there—waiting for her. But somehow she didn't.

And John Harmon, unpacking his bags, stopping to tell her about this or that, asking her if she remembered a certain little street or a restaurant or a shop, knew with a terrible certainty that he had not been wrong; knew that while he had been away something had happened to Stanley. And terror gripped his heart and trembled in his soul and his hands would not stay steady, nor his voice, and as the afternoon wore on he looked at her less and less and talked more and more—or else he would surely have betrayed the fear that grew within him and said to her: "Whatever it is, Stanley, tell me, anything is better than not knowing."

And Stanley kept saying to herself: "Now I will tell him about Drew. And then, very quickly, about the baby and he will forget on the floor.

Corcoran also said that the bill had been agreed upon by the treasury and the federal reserve board. He refused, however, to say that it was endorsed by those agencies, contending that their representatives should speak for themselves.

Corcoran said the outstanding modifications in the new draft were liberalization of margin requirements and regulations concerning segregation of dealers and brokers.

He pointed out that it will not be necessary for loans now outstanding to meet the margin requirements in the new bill until 1935. Corcoran contended that disastrous liquidation of accounts, which banking interests charged would occur if the old bill had been enacted, were eliminated.

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT
"You're an awfully sweet child, Val," Perry told her softly, smiling straight into her eyes with his own half-closed, caressing blue ones. "So I've been told."

Perry replaced his lighter, continued to smile at her. "It would be very easy to love you, Valerie. He reached for her hand, held it lightly, carelessly.

"It would be very easy to let you—love me, Perry." She left her hand in his. Between them a faint cloud of smoke rose and floated ceilingward. The old room was curiously still and filled with shadows and the drifting little breeze and the steady ticking of the old clock on the mantel.

"I may remind you of that sometime," Perry said evenly.
"I wouldn't if I were you," returned Valerie just as evenly, and she slid her hand out of his.
"That's for me to decide."

She shrugged. "Have a nice time up north?"
"Quite—worried a bit about Stanley, though. She was in a rather unsettled mood when I left."

"Well, she's not now. Quite the opposite. She's going to have a baby, Perry."

"She's going to have—what?"
"A baby, stupid. People do, you know." She smiled at him, looked away swiftly.

"So that's the solution, is it?" Perry spoke slowly as though he were thinking aloud. "All this hue and cry about love and desire and little old nature steps in and smacks us one in the face and arranges matters to suit herself." He looked at Valerie, grinned suddenly. "You know, Val, my dear, I'm tremendously relieved—this honesty and whatnot—and then sort of settles things, don't you think?"

Val met his eyes gravely. "A baby usually does, I've noticed."

"And you think it will for Stanley?"
"I think so. She tried to tell me a lot of nonsense about not living with John Harmon any more. I don't know what it was all about exactly—but anyhow she hasn't mentioned it again."

"She won't," he answered, smiling slowly, thoughtfully, "and John Harmon will come back and if she's wise she'll never even let him guess."

Valerie shook her head. "You don't know Stanley, Perry, she's so honest."

"You have lovely eyes, Valerie," he interrupted her irrelevantly, "and an exciting mouth. Sometime, I'd like to kiss you—a lot."

"You wouldn't fool me, would you, mister?"
"No," replied Perry softly, and his fingers found hers and tightened about them, "I wouldn't. Even if I could—I wouldn't."

John Harmon came back the second week in June. But it was Perry who met him at the boat and not Stanley.

BEHIND THE SCENES IN HOLLYWOOD

By HARRISON CARROLL
Copyright, 1934, King Features Syndicate, Inc.

HOLLYWOOD, Cal.,
Not so many years ago, Baby Marie Osborne must have earned several hundred thousand dollars as a child star.

Today, she is deeply grateful for a chance to serve as Ginger Rogers' stand-in.

This particular story of the screen prodigy who lost both fame and dollars might never have come to such a happy ending if it hadn't been for Ginger's mother, Lela.

For Marie Osborne, now married to a young draftsman and the mother of a baby, had been fighting in vain to get back on the screen. For a while, she clerked in a five and ten cent store in Huntington Park. Then, several months ago, she managed to get extra work under Director Henry King at Fox. That job ended and, just for luck, she applied to do a part at the little theater run by Ginger's mother.

Mrs. Rogers came upon the name. She remembered the youngster for whom she used to write scenarios years ago, and she sent for Marie. As a result of the meeting, the former starlet began work yesterday before the cameras started to turn, but she is happy to be back in a studio and hopes that her luck has changed.

Arthur Caesar, who deserted the late spots for the quiet of Laguna Beach, pops up at last with a bon mot.
"I'm writing a book on supervisors," he says. "My title is 'Little Mind, What Now?'"

Mae Clarke phoned the M.G.M. studio not to expect her on March 2, as she intended to spend the day lying in bed in a dark room with all the doors and windows locked.

Two years ago, on the second of March, the star suffered a physical breakdown which kept her off the screen for months.

Last year, on the same date, she broke her jaw in an automobile accident and spent more weeks in idleness.

"I'm not taking any more chances," said Mae.
Film stars receive strange letters but the height of something or other is one that Dorothy Wilson, Paramount starlet, just got from a Candor.
