COUNTY AGENT'S COLUMN

Less intensive feeding is one of the more effective ways by which dairy farmers can bring about the reduction of output proposed in the tentative dairy program of the agricultural adjustment administration.

This means of reduction is emphasized by O. E. Reed, chief of the Bureau of Dairy Industry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, and at one time head of the dairy department of Purdue University, who calls attention to experiments which show that by reducing the grain ration and feeding more roughage greater profit may be made on a lower milk yield.

"When we have good roughage to feed and cut our full grain ration in two, we get approximately 10 per cent less milk than on full grain feeding," says Mr. Reed.

"When we depend on roughage alone, we get about 30 per cent less milk than we get on full grain feeding."

"This drop in production does not involve a corresponding drop in profits. Dairy farmers who plan to feed less grain and grow more roughage will benefit themselves and also agriculture as a whole."

"Less intensive feeding of dairy cattle has not increased in pasture and roughage acreage at the expense of cultivated crops, a shift already taking place in many regions. It helps to solve the grain surplus problem, and to reduce the output of livestock products."

"The dairy farmer's gross income may be less if he has his cows on roughage and pasture; but his costs of production will be less also. It is net income rather than gross income that counts."

"In all regions where grasses or legumes grow well there are opportunities to shift advantageously from grains to grass and other roughage. In some regions legumes do not grow well. Recent scientific findings indicate, however, that other grasses cut in an immature state contain as much protein as do legumes cut at the ordinary stage. The shift to grass and roughage is practicable to some extent almost everywhere."

"Erosion losses are terrific on many lands in cultivated crops. These same lands in pastures and legumes would be protected. Cultivated crops are hard on soil fertility. Pastures and legumes are a partial answer to this problem."

"It is generally assumed that many cows would have to be butchered to accomplish the proposed production, but the fact is that a shift to roughage and grass might make even more cows necessary because of a smaller yield per cow."

Other methods recommended by the Dairy Bureau for meeting the requirements of the proposed dairy adjustment program are: (1) Raising fewer heifers and extending the period of whole milk feeding; (2) Delaying the breeding of heifers; (3) Using more dairy products on the farm; (4) Culling unsound and diseased cows; (5) Slaughtering low producers for home meat.

"THE LONE WOLF'S SON"

by LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE

SYNOPSIS

Sailing from France to America aboard the S.S. "Navarre," Michael Lanyard, reformed "Lone Wolf," erstwhile master crook, meets wealthy Fay Crozier, one of his antique shop patrons, and her lovely daughter Fenno. Mrs. Crozier shows Lanyard the famous Habsburg emeralds which she bought secretly to avoid payment of duty. Lanyard's experienced eye discovers that counterfeiters have been substituted for the gems. He promises to try and retrieve the emeralds. Lanyard suspects Maurice Parry, a youthful fellow-passenger, who appears deeply interested in Fenno. The resemblance between Lanyard and Maurice causes the former to wonder if they are related. In a bridge game with two card sharks, Maurice loses heavily. Lanyard joins the players as Parry's partner, catches their opponents cheating and threatens to expose them unless Maurice's loss is called off. Later, Lanyard tells the appreciative Maurice that he can repay him by returning Mrs. Crozier's jewels. The youth removes the top of his cane only to find that Lanyard had been there before him and had replaced the stolen emeralds with the zircons (false gems). Maurice discloses that he is Lanyard's son whom the latter believed killed during the war. Though happy at the reunion, Lanyard is disappointed to find his son a thief. Maurice explains he was forced to steal since boyhood in order to exist. Lanyard hopes his son's interest in Fenno will continue, for the boy's own good. Detective Crane, whom Lanyard knew from his "Lone Wolf" days, warns him that the two gamblers he exposed are "Jack Knife" Anderson and "English Archie," gangsters, who will seek revenge. Later, while Fenno is speaking with Lanyard, a ship's officer calls him aside to say the liner's captain requests his presence in Fay's cabin.

CHAPTER XI

The sitting-room of the Crozier suite, when Lanyard saw it for the first time, presented for his mystification all the effect of one of those improbable inquiries which take place behind footlights, with poor Mrs. Crozier in the part of the impromptu corpse.

Engagingly disheveled though dressed as if ready to get right up and go on deck, the hapless lady was stretched out with her eyes closed on a sofa and looking decidedly blue about the gills and limping, for once in Lanyard's acquaintance with her, all her age.

The other actors in the scene were the captain, M. Pascal, a sturdy seaman with the steely eyes of tradition in quaint contrast with the complexion of a bisque doll and ripe lips pouting through a black spade-beard; another gentleman with a beard, in this instance grizzled and pointed, the right badge of a ship's doctor, a M. Louvois whose mien was modest and whose other points were equally unimpressive; and one M. Plon, with sly eyes and a sardonic mouth in a plain shaven gray face, whose presence would have been unaccountable, since he didn't sport the ship's cloth, had Lanyard not known him of old as an agent of the Prefecture de Police of Paris.

The Captain, squared to a table with his peaked cap and one clenched hand resting on it, had much the air of a truculent and hairy cherub sitting as cornerer and prepared to call the proceedings to order as soon as the culprit was haled in; the French detective was stationed to one side and observing the invalid with his smallest head at a critical angle; the physician was hovering in solicitous attendance on her.

From the first Lanyard as he entered had a brusque nod, from the second a slanting glance without one gleam of recognition, from the third no sign of interest whatsoever. One of the windows had been opened, a strong salt draught was sweeping through the room, but "Don't worry about me, my dear Lanyard," said the victim weakly. "I'm getting better every minute. Just do what you can, please, to help these gentlemen."

"I'm all right," Fay said, listlessly. "I've been robbed again, that's all."

"Madame has already told us enough, monsieur," Captain Pascal wasn't submitting a suggestion so much as sounding a challenge—"to encourage the hope that you will be able to name the author of this outrage."

"I, monsieur?" Lanyard rounded on him in amazement. "I am altogether at your service, naturally; but I must confess—" "Regard that there is reason to believe the criminal was the same who robbed Madame last night, and whom, she tells us, you know."

"Impossible!"

A cry of incredulous expostulation perhaps natural enough under the circumstances, but one to be repeated as soon as uttered: Lanyard saw it wake cynical glints in the regard of M. Plon and stiffen the Captain's animus as well.

"How is that 'impossible,' monsieur? Who else, except Madame and yourself, knew where the emeralds were to be found?"

"The emeralds, monsieur? But they are in the purser's care."

"What makes you assert that?"

"Madame promised—" "I was too fagged last night to keep my promise,"—Fay Crozier struck a note of childish petulance,—"so I put it off till today; and I had just taken the case from my trunk in there, meaning to go downstairs and give it to the purser myself, when this bandit—"

Her voice began to climb to a hysterical pitch; M. Louvois in a low tone adjured Madame not to excite herself; and she permitted the Captain to round out the account.

"Madame was coming through the bedchamber door when the scoundrel, who must have slipped
