COUNTY AGENT'S COLUMN

"The direct rays of the sun supply vitamin D, an essential part of the chick ration," says Leon Todd, Purdue University extension poultryman, who suggests that most farm flock owners can get their chicks outdoors when ten days to two weeks old.

The ultra violet rays of the sun supply vitamin D, he explains, but do not go through ordinary window glass, and it is necessary to give the chicks access to direct sunlight. A temporary fence may be placed in front of the brooder house for use early in the season so that the chicks are kept from being lost. Some poultry raisers use a platform for this purpose when the soil is contaminated with disease germs.

By placing some of the feeders and fountains in this yard more chicks will be attracted into the sunshine, says Todd. However, these feeders and fountains should be placed back in the house when it is good condition. He does his own repair work, and said he can "do 60 any time."

the chicks cannot be outdoors because of rain or cold weather. On windy days when the sun is shining, he recommends that sacks, canvas, or some solid material, be placed on the side of the fence from which the wind is blowing in order to make the yard more comfortable. He points out that if chicks do not have access to direct sunlight, they will be crowded condition in the brooder house, and that too picking and cannibalism are less likely to start when the chicks are given same range.

It was also brought out by Todd that having the chicks outdoors will relieve any crowded condition in the brooder house, and that too picking and cannibalism are less likely to start when the chicks are given same range.

250,000 Miles And Still Going

Essex, Conn.—(UP)—George Bartlett is not interested in a new car yet. His present machine, he said, has gone 250,000 miles and still is in good condition. He does his own repair work, and said he can "do 60 any time."

Two All-America Petunias

Petunias were conspicuous leaders in the race for honors at the 1934 judging of All-America flowers. One of them, the Dwarf Pink Gem won a gold medal, and was given place in the final selection. Another, Maximum Double Fringed, received an award of merit.

Pink Gem is undoubtedly a forerunner of a new strain of diminutive petunias. With its neat and very compact growth ranging from 6 to 8 inches in height, it is the giant double type. Petunias are predominantly light with some purple. They grow to a height of about 18 inches.

The method of producing this giant petunia is interesting. As they produce no seeds, hand fertilizing is made necessary, and the mother plant, a semi-double, must be stripped of its pollen-producing organs, guarded against cross fertilization with a covering, and then finally pollinated from known giant varieties. In this tedious manner, the final hybrid plant is produced.

Edging, window boxes, bedding, in pots and rock gardens are a few of the uses for this brilliant little bloom, which is free-flowering from summer to frost. It should be treated as a half-hardy annual, and sown shallowly early in the spring in pots or boxes. Light soil, moderate moisture and
