COUNTY AGENT'S COLUMN

A modification of the corn-hog contract now permits limited purchase of extra feeder pigs. In 1934, by a hog producer from other contract signers, in excess of the average number purchased by the producer in the 1932-33 period, according to word received from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration by County Agent Archbold.

Under the original interpretation of the contract, a producer was not permitted to buy feeder pigs in 1934 in excess of the average number purchased by him during the past two years. The amendment was prepared by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to accommodate the producer, particularly by the cattle feeder, whose sows fail to farrow or who does not save enough pigs in 1934 to fill his marketable hog allotment.

In order to qualify for the extra feeder pig purchase privilege, a contract signer will file a request with the county allotment committee, indicating the number of pigs to be bought, from whom they are to be bought, and the reasons for such purchase. This request must be signed by a member of the community committee and approved by the county allotment committee before the pigs can be purchased.

The feeder pigs bought under the terms of the amendment must have been farrowed on farms located in the same county as the land under contract and by sows owned by persons who have executed corn reduction contracts as producers and who have no feeder pig bases. The purchasing producer, however, cannot buy any number of extra feeder pigs over this regular feeder pig allowance, in excess of any short-allowance in the number of pigs which he is permitted by his contract to produce from his own sows. For example, if Farmer A. is allowed to produce from his own sows in 1934, a total of 100 pigs for market, but on account of disease or other causes, only 80 pigs are actually produced for market, then Farmer A., with the consent of his local hog committeemen, might buy not more than 20 extra feeder pigs from other contract signers; that is, Farmer A. might buy a total of not more than 20 feeder pigs in excess of any feeder pig allotment he possesses under the terms of the contract.

THE LONE WOLF'S SON

by LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE

CHAPTER XXXVI

"Don't let him con you into thinkin' he's just an innocent kid and hadn't no hand in this show," the gunman persevered. "He's gummed into it up to his ears along with the rest of us. Ask him yourself, if you don't want to believe me."

She said in a low voice one word: "Maurice!"

"A lie out of whole cloth," the boy with a shrug assured her. "Yet, I confess, like most lies it has a certain substratum of truth."

In the same voice of contained emotion, but now in French, the girl demanded: "You confess it?"

"It is true," Maurice told her in the tongue she had preferred to English in order that, he supposed, their confidences might be private. "I am beyond trying, or even wishing, to deceive you, Fennie. It's true I am a thief, much as my father was in his day, and that I planned to take advantage of your friendship and steal, when opportunity offered, the emeralds. It is true, if you must know, that I had stolen them once already, the first night out on the Navarre; but that time it was my father who out-thought me, found them where I had hidden them, restored them to your mother."

"I thought as much! And the next time—"

"You wrong me if you think that."

The protestation was interrupted by a bitter echo: "Wrong you!" "I swear to you, Fennie, I had nothing to do with that affair, except that it was I who found them hidden in my father's trunk, and having substituted the zircons, threw them in through the purser's window in the packet marked with your mother's name."

"Because I conceived, like a dunce, it was my father who had stolen them, and feeling certain that his luggage would be searched, thought to shield him. Also—the boy took a deep breath and braced himself to bear her gaze—"because I had been thinking the business over and come to the conclusion that it would be more sensible to wait till the emeralds had been brought ashore before I tried again."

"Did you have to tell me that?" "I intend that there shall never again be anything but the truth between you and me, Fennie."

"Oh, these mad infatuations for the truth that men contract from time to time—and always when it's most untimely!" The girl gave a broken laugh and moved away a little, averting her face. "You might have spared me!"

"But I think it is myself that I am not sparing!"

"Of course you do—being a man and thinking, therefore, of yourself only!"

"Could I—loving you as I do—let you go on believing me other than I am?"

She looked at him again with a wistful half-smile, a tired smile, at once understanding and reproachful.

"You love me?" "You know it."

"Then you might have let me go on hoping—"

"You are telling me you cared enough to hope?"

"I may have thought I did—until tonight." She begged the issue with a weary movement of her shoulders. "Not that it matters."

"It matters like life and death to me."

"You ask me to believe that, after what has happened here to-night! After you have allied yourself with common criminals to bring this to pass!"

"If you choose to believe this thug against the evidence of your reason."
