Queer Pipe Found In Illinois

Lincoln, Ill.—(U.P.)—Carved of stone and encrusted with figures of beetles, the head of an eagle and grotesque humans, a pipe, believed

"MA CINDERELLA" by Harold Bell Wright

SYNOPSIS

Years ago, Ann Haskel, dominant Ozark farmer, sent her fatherless son, John Herbert, away in the care of Judge Shannon, so that the boy could be educated properly. No one knew the heartache this sacrifice caused Ann. In John Herbert's place, Ann raised a ne'er-do-well stepson, Jeff Todd. Ann, Jeff, and Nance Jordan, Ann's housekeeper, live together on the farm. Following graduation from college, John Herbert returns home and is stunned to find his mother a crude mountain woman, but he overlooks this in gratitude for all she did for him. Ann, on the other hand, is disappointed that her son is anxious to write instead of practicing law. John Herbert tries to explain to his mother that it is just as necessary to feed the spiritual appetite as the physical. "I reckon he's too late for me ever to rightly understand him," Ann says wistfully. Diane Carrol, a young artist, who values her work above her wealth, which she keeps secret, and John Herbert become boon companions. One day, Jeff, jealous of John Herbert, tries in vain to get his stepbrother to fight. Ann tells John Herbert he will have to fight Jeff or there won't be any living for him or her. She is as puzzled by her son's ignorance of backwoods ethics as he is bewildered by her attitude. Ann hears the vacationists at the Lodge jokingly call her "Ma Cinderella" and resents their ridicule. Diane encourages John Herbert to continue with his writing, but he realizes it will be years before he has a decent income and can repay his mother. The Lodge guests continue to poke fun at his mother. This makes John Herbert realize that, with his responsibilities, Diane is beyond his reach and he avoids her. She, however, thinks of him constantly. Never before had she been so attracted to any man and John Herbert needed her.

CHAPTER XXII

This crisis in his life was a very real crisis. His future might easily be determined by the outcome. On the one hand his chosen work for which he was well equipped, where he was so well equipped; on the other his loyalty to his backwoods mother and the demands which she made upon his sense of duty. His very helplessness was a powerful appeal to Diane's womanhood. When she had left him standing there under the twin oaks and had felt him looking after her as she walked down the woodland road, she had been moved by an almost irresistible impulse to go back to him. She had wanted to say, "You are not alone, because I am here. This is not your trouble; it is our trouble. It is for us to face this thing together." But something had told her that she must wait.

It would be so easy to solve John Herbert's problem, she reflected, if only she might be permitted to finance him until he could succeed in establishing himself. Why should she not help him in this way? The financial backing which she had received from her father had been a large factor in her own success. She had, literally, more money than she knew what to do with. Her inherited fortune was growing steadily, and her income from her work was increasing. But even as she argued with herself that there was no real reason why she should not help Ann Haskel's son with money, she knew that it was impossible. The joy of their friendship, she felt was in no small part due to the fact that John Herbert knew nothing about the Carrolls or the Carroll fortune. He knew only that he was alone in the world—that she was the last of the Carrolls, as he was the last of the Haskels. From the first he had assumed that she was dependent upon her work as he himself must be dependent upon his work. As their friendship developed she had been careful not to enlighten him. She had been too happy in being valued for herself. Aside from the certainty that the young man's native pride would prevent him from accepting money from her, of all people, if she offered it he would quite likely learn of the financial and social gulf which lay between them. Diane feared this more than she feared Ann Haskel. She realized that some day he would discover the truth about her. But more than anything else in the world she wanted the last of the Haskels to remain for a while longer ignorant of the Carroll fortune. She was wishing, too, that she knew much less than she did about John Herbert's background. She was saying to herself: "If only there were no Ann Haskel, no Jeff Todd, no Nance Jordan, no mystery, no illiterate backwoods environment, with half-veiled hints of wickedness."

THIMBLE THEATER

to be of Aztec origin was unearthed here recently by Ira Potter as he was digging in his garden. The bowl of the pipe shows considerable wear. On the outside is a perfect circle of carved figures and on the inside are other carvings. When compared with pictures of ancient carvings the pipe resembles that of the Aztecs.

Get the Habit—Trade at Home

"How come you ain't makin' no pitcher, miss?"
Ann Haskel had approached to within a few feet of Diane so silently that the young woman was unaware of her presence until that harsh voice broke in upon her meditation.
"Oh!" exclaimed the startled girl. "You frightened me."
The mountain woman stared at her. "You ain't got no call to be afraid of me yet. Why ain't you makin' no pitcher? This here stretch of river's sure pretty 'nough to put a pitcher in."
