Mechanical Brain Weighs
Three Tons, at University

Philadelphia — (UP) — A three-ton mechanical brain, which solves problems the human mind cannot even grasp, is ready for assembly at the University of Pennsylvania. The huge machine, made of 75,000 gears, cogs, wheels and mechanical amplifying mechanisms, has two and a half times the "mental capacity" of a similar machine at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

It will require only 15 minutes, Prof. Charles DeV. Fawcett said, for the "brain" to solve a problem in ballistics on which five expert United States army mathematicians recently worked four months. "Charlie," as the students call the machine, is particularly apt at doing differential equations. Astronomers, it is expected, will find "Charlie" a very useful assistant.

"MA CINDERELLA"
by Harold Bell Wright

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"And now that you have succeeded in placing Ma Cinderella in her proper environment, what do you propose to do next?" Belden went on.

The girl answered, moodily, "I am returning to New York tomorrow."

"Hum-m—yes. I think that is best. Will you see the young man before you go?"

"That would spoil everything, wouldn't it? John Herbert's loyalty to his mother, his feeling of obligation to her—for all she has done for him—until she changes her views somewhat. Besides—" the paused.

"Besides what, Diane?"

"We promised each other we would wait until his mother learns how wrong she is."

"Right, dear, quite right. You'd better go back to New York at once. Just leave everything to me."

Diane leaned toward him eagerly, and her eyes were shining, her cheeks glowing. "You are going to help, Uncle Jim? You will be a friend to Ann Haskel and—John Herbert? You will help them—and me?"

The old lawyer lifted his white head with judicial dignity and, making a desperate effort to hold a professional pose, answered, deliberately:

"As your attorney, young woman, I must still advise you against your scheme. It is fantastic, irregular, impractical, and dangerous. As an old friend of your father's I sympathize with the spirit of your undertaking and can understand your point of view. As a bachelor of many years I am intrigued with—ad—certain aspects of the case. My duty to you compels me to advise caution, while my long acquaintance with Judge Shannon, who raised this boy, inclines me to suspect that the last of the Haskels is a gentleman of quality. And so, my dear girl, for reasons not strictly legal, but none the less sound, I shall do what I can."

But Diane did not go to New York the following day, as she had planned.

For almost the first time in her life Bill Carroll's daughter found difficulty in carrying out a decision. Day after day she put off going away. She knew she ought not to remain. She had told Mr. Belden definitely that she was going. Often she took herself sternly to task, and as often neglected to do that which her judgment told her was best.

Then one day she stepped from the elevator at the fifth floor of the hotel where she was staying, to find herself face to face with two of her Wilderness Lodge friends—her hostess at the Lodge, Mrs. Jones-Williams, and Sally McBride, another of the younger married-divorced-and-re-married set.

There were exclamations of mutual surprise, hilarious greetings, a confusion of excited questions and exclamations; the elevators went up and down and the two Wilderness Club ladies accompanied Diane to her rooms.

"Whatever are you doing here?"

"We supposed you were safely back in your New York."

"I'm simply perishing for a drink." "We've been shopping for hours and hours." "Dropped in here at George Selwin's for first aid." "The rotter wasn't in."

"Beastly luck." "I'm simply perishing."

"Sorry," said Diane, "but I haven't a thing. I have been held here on business about the estate. I'm leaving for New York in the morning."

"Of course you wouldn't have anything on your hip." "But why are you living in this dump?"

"Yes, why aren't you in your own home?"

Diane explained lamely: "Why, you see, I have been expecting every day to leave for the East. The hotel seemed easier. I'm taking Wilson with me—that is, I mean, he will come as soon as he closes things up, you know."

"Huh! You sound damn money to me." "I suppose you know what happened right after you left the wilderness?" "She means right here in the city—Ann. The woods colt, and your own devoted John Herbert?" "Left all of a sudden—nobody knows why."

"Revenuers, everybody thinks." "Ann certainly had it coming to her." "Foxy old gal—tipped off, no doubt." "The station agent told us the day we were leaving."

a Junior Church organized; a Scout Troop organized; the Unit Plan of parish operation installed; a "pay-as-you-go" policy of church business which for the past four years has met all bills month by month as due and has paid all salaries weekly; a nursery organized and a room remodeled and equipped for its use; and the successful operation of the unified service of worship and study with nursery, primary, Junior and senior sections meeting simultaneously on Sunday morning in a two-hour program.

Rev. Carson and family expect to move into the Methodist parsonage early next week.

The supreme court held "the fund was established for construction and maintenance of county roads, and since there was a balance in the fund, it could see no reason why the commissioners should not retire the bonds, a legitimate debt against the road fund."

"I'll tell you what, let's throw a party for her—you know, the old Cinderella motif." "Grand! It's an inspiration!"

"Grand! It's an inspiration!"

Diane tried in vain to change the subject. They were delicious with their brilliant idea. They shrieked with laughter in anticipation of the fun to be had out of the backwoods woman. They complained that the town was dead. They must do something to wake things up, or perish. They would start the season with a Wilderness Club ball, with, as they put it, "Ann Haskel in her Ma Cinderella act." They would pass the word, quietly, of course, that they had captured a genuine female moonshining hill-billy. What a stunt! It would be the sensation of the season.

When Diane had finally seen her vivacious callers into the elevator, she returned to her rooms with a heavy heart.

"What," she asked herself, desperately—"what could she do?" How could she manage to thwart the inconsiderate and cruel plans of these reckless devotees to thrill and kick and punch and wallow? What if these irresponsible seekers after excitement should find the Haskels, now, in Diane's old home? If they did, Ann and her son would be sure to discover the trick Diane had played on them. Then what?

The artist squirmed as she recalled the ragging she had endured at the Lodge because of her friendship with John Herbert, following, as it did, that night which they had spent together in the woods. The Lodge crowd had shown no excess of delicacy in expressing their views as to the nature of Diane's interest in Ann Haskel's son, and their views had been modern in the extreme. The girl grew cold, now, at the thought of what they would believe and say if they should discover this development of her backwoods summer affair, as they called it. For her to attempt an explanation would be hopeless. They were as incapable of understanding her motives and the nature of her friendship with John Herbert as she was incapable of the sort of thing with which they charged her. As to how Ann Haskel and John Herbert would react to her uninvited and secret interest in their affairs she dared not even try to imagine.

Diane Carol had known before she left the Ozarks that what John Herbert thought of her was the most wonderful and quite the most important thing in her life. And she was as happily sure of his thoughts of her as if he had spoken them. But Diane knew, too, that day when Ann Haskel had warned her to "let her son alone," that there was no hope for herself and John Herbert as long as the mountain woman believed her to be "just one of that no-count, triffin', cain-reisin' Lodge crowd."

She had been so happy over the success of her plan and in picturing John Herbert living in her old home. She had felt so sure that in such environment the mountain woman's conception of life, and the values which she had so contemptuously placed upon the work of writers and artists, would be changed. It was impossible, now, for the girl to go away to New York and calmly await developments. In an agony of uneasiness and anxiety she stayed on. Repeatedly she told herself that if the threatening crash should come it would be better for her to be away. But she felt that no matter what happened, she must be at hand. Many times she was tempted to see John Herbert and explain. Frequently she drove past her old home. Once she caught a glimpse of Ann and Nance.

Then it happened. Six of the Wilderness Club cohorts fell upon the artist with excited cries of triumph.

"No wonder you didn't go back to New York!" "Been held here by business of the state. Phooey!" "I'll say she's been held by business." "Thought you could put one over on us, did you?" "What dy' mean stealin' our Cinderella stuff an' keepin' the fun all to yourself?"

Diane asked, desperately: "What on earth are you crazy bats raving about? What's the joke?" "Joke!" they shouted, with jeering laughter. "Would you listen to her!" "The nerve of some people." "Yeah, the nerve of fairy godmothers, you mean!"
