Gross Public Debt Reaches New Peak

Washington, June 18—(U.P.)—The gross public debt of the United States government reached an all time record high of $27,000,000,000 today, surpassing the war time peak of $26,596,701,448 reached on August 31, 1919.

With this month's securities sale of $557,749,086 the public debt on June 15 stood at $27,005,438,125. The treasury, however, had a cash balance of $2,759,605,523 on June 15, whereas in August, 1919, it amounted to only $1,118,109,535, making the net debt at the present time still smaller than the war time peak.

CHAPTER XXXV

John Herbert was ready nearly an hour before the appointed time. Under the stress of his apprehension he paced the floor of his room, looked at his watch every other minute, consulted the mirror, rearranged his tie, and tried in various ways to regain a reasonable degree of composure. He would be calm enough, he promised himself, once the ordeal was under way. Finding it impossible to remain in his room, he went downstairs with the thought of walking about the grounds.

At the foot of the stairs he paused to look about. During the activities of preparation the young man had recognized that the affair was in competent hands and had been grateful for his backwoods mother's wisdom in trusting everything to Wilson and his experts. But tonight, as he viewed the results, he felt more than relieved. There was something more than mere beauty in the arrangements. There was a feeling, a touch, a spirit which brought from him an involuntary exclamation. It was so right, so exactly what one required of such a home. There was no feeling that florid and decorator, with their minds on their fees, had done too much. Indeed, there was no feeling of the hired professional at all. Neither was there anywhere a suggestion of backwoods taste. He experienced all at once a thrill of confidence. Recalling his mother's reference to the Sleeping Beauty story, he smiled with the thought: "Who ever awake this old house to such gay and brilliant loveliness must have done it with a kiss."

Suddenly he heard voices. The speakers were hidden by a bank of ferns, but he recognized Wilson saying, "Yes, miss; very good, miss; I understand perfectly." The reply came in low tones: "I think there is nothing more, then, Wilson. You may go now. I will wait in the library for the family to come down."

"Very good, miss." The speakers moved away. John Herbert stood rooted to the spot with amazement. He could not be mistaken. But what—how? This was magic sure enough. Half-dazed, bewildered, doubting his senses, but certain that his ears had not deceived him, he went to the library. Hearing his exclamation as he stood in the doorway, Diane turned to face him.

It was probably sheer instinct which prompted John Herbert to swing the door shut as he strode into the room. Certainly what followed was not dictated by deliberate reason. The impulses and unpremeditated actions of men and women, we are informed, are usually caused by "instinct." Now and then, as we all know, reason is caught asleep at the switch.

Presently, with a reluctant effort, the girl freed herself. The next instant she had placed half the width of the room between them. John Herbert, gazing at her wonderingly, said, solemnly: "And there are people who do not believe in fairies! What fools what unutterably pitiable fools!"

Diane was gowned as if for a royal reception. He had never seen her before except in costumes suitable to her work and play in the wilderness. Her beauty stirred in him an odd feeling of awe. Now that he had time ready to look at her he was afraid. She seemed to be so remote—so inaccessible. "I never knew you were like this," he muttered, haltingly.

She laughed—a little laugh of appreciation. "I never saw you in evening clothes, either. You certainly don't look much like the hill-billy that I—" She paused and her blush gave him courage to finish the sentence for her—"That you fell in love with, Diane?"

He made a move toward her, but she quickly retreated behind the library table.

"No, no, John Herbert. If you are going to forget your promise, if we are not to keep our agreement and wait until things are different—I shall disappear again, this minute." She made a tentative movement toward the door.

"Forgive me," he cried, quickly. "I'll be good. I won't forget again." "That's better," she returned coolly, even though her eyes denied the calmness of her manner. "But I don't understand," he said. "I thought you were in New York. What are you doing here?"

"She echoed his questions in a tone of mock surprise. "What am I doing here? That's a pretty thing for a host to ask his guest. I came to your party, of course. I must have mistaken the time," she added, apologetically.

"It's not my party," he retorted, with a quick change of mood; "it's mother's." She had it all arranged before I knew anything about it."

"Well, your mother invited me. There is no reason why I should not be here, is there?"

"That depends," he returned, grimly. "You know, of course, why that Lodge crowd is coming?"

"I can imagine. Perhaps that's why I came."

"I wonder? Well, I hope you all have a pleasant evening. The show ought to be worth the price of admission."

"I don't think I like that, John."

Presently, with a reluctant effort, Diane freed herself.

Herbert," she said, steadily. "This may not be your party, as you say, but you'd better make it yours."

Before he could stop her she had reached the door and was out of the room.

As he overtook her, Diane, with a low exclamation, directed his attention to his mother, who was slowly descending the stairway.

Ann Haskel, not noticing the two who stood watching her with such interest, paused at the foot of the stairway, as her son had done, to view the scene.

"How beautiful!" exclaimed Diane under her breath. "Isn't she splendid? I always knew it was there, but this—this is quite beyond anything I could imagine. It is magnificent. Her pose is regal. She is every bit a queen, and she knows it. Lord what a picture!"

Now was the artist's enthusiastic admiration in the least prejudiced. Dressmakers, hairdressers, and beauty specialists had worked their magic. Their training had enabled them to recognize the possibilities of the mountain woman's personality. Pride in their art, and no restriction as to their fees, had led them to exert themselves to the utmost. Ann Haskel, as she stood against the background of the proud old Carol home, was a picture of royal womanhood worthy of any artist's brush.

"She said she would show them," murmured John Herbert, feebly.

But it was the uncouth woman of the mountains that greeted Diane a moment later.

"Howdy, miss. I'm sure glad you come. This year party wouldn't noways be complete without you. What's the rest of your crowd? Didn't you all come together?"

Diane and John Herbert winced at the question.

The girl answered, quickly: "I came alone, Mrs. Haskel. It was so good of you to ask me."

"Ain't been to see we-uns since we-uns come to the city? I don't reckon you forgot to tell her where we war a-go-in." She could 'a' found us at the hotel same's Belden did if she war a-wantin' to be real sure 'nough friends. If she ain't one of the Lodge folks, what's she comin' hiear with 'em fer?"

A sudden thought struck John Herbert—a wild, improbable, fanciful possibility. What was it he had heard Diane saying to the butler?

"But she didn't come with these people," he said. "She came alone. You'll see, before this evening is over, that you're all wrong about Diane, mother."

"I aim to see a lot of things to-night," the mountain woman answered, "about you an' me an' Diane an' them Lodge folks an' everything. That's what I'm havin this hiear party fer."

Mrs. Jones-Williams whispered with great excitement to her escort: "My Gawd! George Selvin, do you see what I'm seeing, or did you dope that last cocktail?"

The chorus chimed in with: "Look at Ann Haskel." "I'm looking at her son." "That dress is Paris, or I'm a fish." "Isn't he simply gorgeous? Look at those shoulders!" "She looks every inch a queen." "Ye gods! what a stunning pair!" "Antonio Casanova's orchestra!" "The Mayfair Caterers, I bet."

"How has that backwoods woman done it?" "Look, look—over there! It's Diane Carroll!" "Yes, an' she's dolled up as if for a presentation ceremony."

"Darn but I feel a fool!" "Who the de-iv had the brilliant idea that we should come in these summer-vacation t-gs, anyway?" "Some slumming expedition, I'll tell the world!"

Canterbury Archbishop Asks Pope to Avert

In a startling plea to his holiness Pope Pius XI to help avert war, the Most Reverend Cosmo Gordon Lang, archbishop of Canterbury, and primate of the English church, stressed the peril surrounding world peace. In a speech before a gathering in London, the archbishop asked the spiritual head of Catholics to call upon a tian churches of the world to promote a spirit of christianity. In the photos shown, Archbishop Lang of Canterbury; center, cathedral in the Vatican City, and on the Pope Pius XI.

Keep Watch of the Bugs

While June brings the great floral pageant in the garden with peonies, irises, roses and delphiniums, it is the month in which the insect pests bring their families into the world to devour everything in sight in myriads. Every day must be one of watchfulness to kill them before they get a start. The insecticide business has now reached such a point that there are preparations ready to slay any sort of pest. Ask the seedsman to recommend one for your particular pest. They are all tested scientifically and are of proven efficacy.

There are two main classes of pests, the chewing and the sucking insects. The former are represented by the races of slugs and worms so called, really caterpillars or larvae of either beetles or moths or butterflies. Cabbage and currant worms are the most familiar and prevalent examples.

Plant lice make up the great family of sucking insects. In addition there are most troublesome pests known as mites. Red spiders are the commonest and the deadly larkspur "blacks," a pest which has driven these magnificent perennials out of many gardens is due, it is now known, to a mite. There are special remedies for mites and for the larkspur blight mite in particular. Ask for these.

In addition to the insect pests there are the mildews and molds. Bordeaux mixture is the standard remedy for these. Tobacco is the standard principle to destroy plant lice and arsenical compounds for the chewers. The seedsman can recommend you an efficacious compound. There are general mixtures which combine cures for both insect and mildew pests.

Most of these poisons are applied in the form of a spray. A sprayer to convert the liquid poison into a fine mist must be added to the list of garden tools and a powder gun for insecticides that are applied as a dust. The sprayer should be one of the easiest operations on the market. They are better than the small hand sprayers which are exhausting if any amount of territory is to be covered. For larger gardens a bucket spray pump is the most convenient or a compressed air spray.
