President Leaves Hawaiian Islands

Aboard the U. S. S. New Orleans, with President Roosevelt, July 30—(By radio to the United Press)—President Roosevelt poured over the reports on federal projects in the far west today as the U. S. S. Houston carried him toward Astoria, Ore., next port of call on his vacation trip.
The President's study of the navigation, navigation and hydroelectric projects sponsored by his "new deal" in the Pacific northwest was to be broken during the day by a little diversion—the resumption of tactical maneuvers between his flagship and its convoy, the New Orleans.

newspaper men and photographers.

A week ago they were smashing cameras and denying reporters admittance to their homes. Yesterday they were answering all questions graciously and posing for pictures willingly.

The act brought criticism yesterday from the Rev. M. Millard, pastor of the Broadway M. E. church. "In the name of the youth of Indiana and for the sake of the name of our state, I protest against the continuation of this sensationalism."

DEATH SONG!

by JOAN CLAYTON AND MALCOLM LOGAN

CHAPTER XXIX

"Shall I tell Mark you'll be in later?" I asked.
"Yes," Finn said. Anderson stood aside as the sheriff and the girl went into the office. Dr. Calvert stood looking after them for a minute. Then he straightened his shoulders and walked in after them. The door closed.

I went on thoughtfully to Mark's room. Sue was with him. "Hello, Sue," I said. "Hi, Mark." "Hi yourself," he said. "What happened to Clendening?" "Dr. Calvert's prediction came true," I answered. "The day Vail was killed the doctor said that curiosity would kill Clendening some day, and it has."

"Was he dead when you got there?" Mark demanded.
I nodded. Mark clutched wildly at his disordered hair. "Then you didn't find out what he wanted to see you about? Nobody there knew what he found?"

"No. Cross was in Ruxton's room. Neither of them even heard Clendening telephoning. All they knew was that he was prowling around outside the cottage just before the storm."

"That's probably what killed him," Sue said.
"Ruxton has a hunch he was frightened or attacked," I told them. "He wasn't able to give any reason for believing it. The place seems to be getting on his nerves."

"Poor man," Sue said. "It's his illness."
"It's been full of melancholy forebodings since Vail was killed," Mark agreed. "I wouldn't like to live in that cottage myself." He frowned and began plucking at his hair again. "Now, what could Clendening have found, or imagined he found, outside the cottage?"

"Why speculate?" I asked. "We'll never know, and something more important has happened, anyway. Felipa's come back."

Mark sat up. He reached for the telephone. "That's news for Finn," he cried.
"He knows it already," I said. "In fact, he's questioning Felipa now. Clendening telephoned him before he called you."

"Gosh, I wish he'd give me a chance at her," Mark said. "I want to know why she ran away!"
"She almost got away again. Anderson told her to get her things and get out, and if the sheriff hadn't come up to see Clendening, he probably never would have seen her."

Mark chuckled. "Anderson must have needed that permanent smile of his when the sheriff walked in on him." He rubbed his hands. "Well, well, life's getting interesting again!"

Mark fretted for half an hour, wondering whether the sheriff was coming to see him, before Finn arrived. The sheriff looked angry and disappointed, though he tried to hide that from us.

"How are you, Mr. Hillier?" he said, and to Sue, "How are you, Miss?"
Sue and Mark said hello to him and Mark added, "I hear there's been a lot of excitement around the place today."

"Do you know what Clendening called me about?" Finn asked.
Mark shook his head. "I haven't any idea," he said. "The last I heard of him, he was trying to find some hidden meaning in the record of 'Waiting For You.'"

"You haven't got any idea what he might have been looking for?" "No. He isn't one of my assistants."

The sheriff reached in his coat pocket. When his hand came out there was a small round metal object in it.
"I found this in the pocket of his dressing gown," Finn said.

As Mark took it in his hand, I saw it was a metal button that the sheriff had found. Mark held it close to his eyes and read aloud. "Short-Cart." He looked puzzled for a minute and then said, "Oh, yes, the overall manufacturers. Well, that's interesting. There was a button missing from the overalls you found in the lake, I remember."

Finn nodded. "I figure Clendening picked this up somewhere outside the cottage. If we only knew where, it might mean something."

"Yes," Mark said. "Well, I'm sorry, sheriff, but I didn't commission Clendening to look for it, and I haven't any idea where he found it. It's just another clue that's flopped, like the picture Loren took." He paused and lit a cigarette. "What about Felipa? Did she tell you anything?"

The sheriff's face reddened. "Not yet," he said grimly, "but she will!"

"Why did she say she ran away?" "She said she was scared," Finn answered. "That's her story, and she's sticking to it."
"Where has she been?" "In New York, with some other friends."
"I suppose she walked past the lake to the state road and got a lift to some town where she could get a bus, didn't she?" Mark asked. "That's just what she did," Finn said.

"Why did she come back?" "Well, her story is that her friends in New York told her she was liable to get in trouble, hiding out. My guess would be she came violence. I don't think an autopsy will be necessary."

He was about to leave when there was another knock. This time it was Felipa and the deputy. The girl looked sullen and frightened. "Buenas dias, Felipa," Mark said. He smiled at her very kindly, and added something in Spanish. Felipa's dark-circled eyes lost some of their fright. She replied rapidly in her own language. Mark answered her and then turned to the sheriff.

"I've told her that it is impossible for you to believe that she is telling the whole truth. I said that we all want to help her, but that she must be frank."

"There's no need to bully her," Calvert said quietly. "I wrote the note."

back when she read in the papers that the case was closed."

Mark nodded. "And besides, her money was still in the bank here. I'd like to see her, sheriff. Where is she?"

"She's still in Anderson's office. I got a deputy with her."

"Did you ask her if she left a note when she ran away?" Finn grinned craftily. "I didn't ask her. I told her I wanted to know what she said in the note."

His expression changed to one of disgust. "She said it was a note to Anderson, saying she had to go to New York." He shook his head. "There's nothing slyer than one of these women when they don't want to talk."

"I wish you'd bring her in here. I can speak Spanish a little, and she might talk to me."

The sheriff shrugged. "If I can't make her talk, you can't," he said. "I don't mind if you take a try at it, though."

He picked up the telephone and asked for Anderson's office. When the deputy answered the telephone, he ordered Felipa brought to Mark's room.

"Thanks," Mark said. He smiled at Sue. "How's the million-dollar smile working today, sweetheart?" he asked.

"About ninety-nine cents worth," Sue replied pertly. "It might work with Felipa, though. She's a simple soul."

Mark grimaced at her and began to smooth his hair and adjust an imaginary necktie. There was a knock on the door and he turned and smiled dazlingly in that direction as he said, "Come in."

We all burst out laughing, for it was Dr. Calvert, not Felipa, who entered. He looked somewhat surprised and asked, "What's funny?"

"Mark is," I replied. "That smile was supposed to knock you over, doctor."

"Sorry I'm so unresponsive," he said. He looked at Sue and said, "Now, if it had been your smile—" Then, recalling himself, he cleared his throat embarrassedly and said to the sheriff in a very business-like voice:

"I've just made a very complete examination of Clendening's body. There's absolutely no evidence of figures for Lehigh County reveal that an all-time record number of 873 marriage licenses were applied for during the first six months of 1934. But for the same period 58 couples filed libels for divorce.

Republicans are expected to see the many escapes as campaign material, claiming that politics should be taken out of the prison.

Wayne Coy, secretary to the governor, in charge of penal affairs, has been investigating the escape Saturday. He is expected to report the result of his investigation to the governor early this week.

Hammond Workers Abandon Strike
Hammond, Ind., July 30—(UP)—More than 600 employees of the Shell petroleum corporation plant at East Chicago returned to work today following settlement of a strike which has kept them idle since July 2.

An agreement was reached between union representatives and company officials at St. Louis over the week-end.
All pickets were withdrawn from strikers.

The administration has been blamed by critics for the escape of ten members of the John Dillinger gang last September, the parole of Dillinger himself, more than a year ago, frequent escapes by trustees and the most recent outbreak in which two trustees and five inmates of the prison hospital walked away early Saturday morning.

Despite his friendship for warden Kunkel, it was pointed out, McNutt may be forced to make a change in the prison administration because of the proximity of the fall campaign.
