Six cities in the state plan to band together to develop the best women racquet swingers in the state. They are going to sponsor two tournaments a month between players from Salt Lake City, Logan, Ogden, Provo, Price, Magna, and Bingham.
Sponsors believe that from such an intensive competitive campaign

CAROLINE by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

SYNOPSIS
The depression did not alter life at "Hawthorn," the comfortable, hospitable home of the Philip Rutledges. Caroline, their lovely daughter, entertained lavishly and the younger set swarmed there. Mrs. Rutledge spends most of her time abroad and her husband practically lives at the club. Following her mother's return from one of her trips, Caroline gives a party. The pampered Alva notes how capably her daughter has arranged everything and wishes she could feel happier about it. Caroline's parents disapprove of their daughter's fiancé, Howard Dunsforth. Years ago, Howard's father bought property from Philip saying he wanted it for a leather factory and instead he went into the soap business in competition with Philip. The families have been enemies ever since. At the height of the party, Philip arrives home with the news that Henry Dunsforth has ruined him. Howard seems genuinely shocked. Philip tells Howard and Caroline that Dunsforth Sr.'s next move will be to break their engagement and he suggests they talk it over. "Of course, it can't make any difference to us," Caroline tells Howard. "No," he agrees, but his voice lacks warmth.

CHAPTER III
"Do you understand it, Howard? Oh no," she added quickly as his face darkened. "I don't mean to ask if you knew of it before today. But do you know what it means to father?"
"How should I know?" he countered.
"But I'm sure that everything father had was in the factory," Caroline explained. "If he's lost that we're broke except for this house. I'd hate to part with this place, Howard."
"Yes," he said, "it is a charming house."
"I'd hate mother and father to lose it. Suddenly she uttered a gasp of dismay as a new and troubling thought came to her. "Perhaps father won't be able to remodel the farm house for us now!" she cried, referring to the old dwelling on the estate, where the overseer had lived when the owners of Hawthorn House were gentlemen farmers.

Howard answered with a show of firmness. "Really, Caro, you'll get yourself into a frightful state of nerves if you keep this up. Take it easy, get used to it before you turn it inside out."
"I can't shelve it," Caroline said tensely. "I'm like that Howard, you know it. I must face issues, something drives me to it."
"But you're making me darned uncomfortable, since, as you say, my dad had a large finger in the pie."
"But you agreed that didn't matter," she replied swiftly. "I suppose I might keep my concern for Mother and father to myself. But what will we do, Howard? How will we face our own future?"
"I'd rather not talk about it, Caro. I'll have to think."
"Please let us think it out together. I'm lost, Howard; not afraid, just lost. Do you think it true what Father said, about your father, I mean? Breaking us up?"
"Well," Howard said growing blunt with his mounting impatience, "if you must have it, I'm afraid it's true all right."
"But he couldn't! How could he?"
"He's taken one important step already," Howard told her. "He cut my allowance completely when I became engaged to you."
"Oh, he is! Isn't he? And you were too sweet to tell me."
"I wasn't greatly worried about it," Howard admitted. "As he didn't threaten to disinherit me. And I've had the money my grandmother left me."
"That's why he didn't try to frighten you with threats. He knew he couldn't."
"Not so long as you were an heir," Howard said quietly, and waited for her to grasp the significance of his words. Caroline's mind was occupied in another direction, however.

"I shan't mind living on what your grandmother left you," she said.
"But Caro, it's very little," Howard declared.
"Is it enough for an apartment? Or Mother and Father might have us here—if they stay on. Would you dislike that Howard?"
"Caro, you know they have no use for me."
"They don't know you. When you're one of us they'll forget that you're Henry Dunsforth's son. But I'd like the apartment if you'd prefer it—even if it's just two or three rooms and a kitchenette."
Howard said, with a sort of feeble horror: "Oh lord. With me drying the dishes, I suppose. Caro, for heaven's sake, get back into your right mind."
She looked at him, and her eyes were suddenly darkened with a think of me! Well, you are wrong—I'd have been happy with you anywhere before you said that. But at least you needn't think so contemptibly of me as to believe I'll wait for you to break our engagement." With a gesture of scorn she stripped off his engagement ring and held it out to him.

Howard refused to take it. "Caro, be reasonable," he urged. "Wait, there might be a way. Things may not be so bad as your father thinks. You know I'm crazy about you. . . . But not crazy enough to marry with a poor girl." Caroline broke in with a stormy laugh. "Take your ring, Howard. There's one girl in town who hasn't seen it, and she has money enough for you!"
Howard Dunsforth liked to think of himself as a pretty decent sort, considering the temptations to mistakes and the pitfalls that beset the painful suspicion. "What can we do then?" she asked levelly.

"I'm sure I don't know," he answered lamely. "I haven't enough money to support us."
Caroline's voice held steady, but she could feel a tightness in her throat as she put her next question. "You haven't lost what you had from your grandmother, have you?"
"No, but it's not enough for us to live on."
"But what had you planned on, before this?"
Howard's irritation broke through his control. "See here, Caro," he said unpleasantly, "this sounds like a school boy's catchism. I must say I thought you were as sensible about money as I."

"What do you mean, Howard, sensible?" Caroline persisted.
"We've never earned any money, you or I," Howard began. "We've always had it from our parents. What would it have mattered whose parent? If I lost my allowance through marrying you would it have been more than fair that your father should provide for us?"
"So that's what you counted on—my father's support," Caroline said quietly.
"Naturally. With the house he was giving us we could have got along very well on what I have and a lift now and then. Dad wouldn't have had a club to wield over me. He'd never have given your father the satisfaction of doing more for me than he did. I'd have inherited his money some day. It's different now. If we marry he'll cut me off, and if I know you it wouldn't please you any more to be poor than it would me."

Anger flamed quickly to Caroline's cheeks. "Is that what you
