mounted police, provincial police, and detectives centered in the south central part of Ontario.

"A break" in the hunt for the kidnapers this afternoon was hinted at by police officials who said that "there are reasons why no more can be said now."

Police officials reportedly were

SYNOPSIS

The Philip Rutledges and Henry Dunsworth have been enemies for years, but love sometimes laughs at feuds, so Howard Dunsworth becomes engaged to lovely Caroline Rutledge despite their parents' opposition. Then Henry ruins Philip in business. This changes everything. "If we marry, my father will cut me off and, if I know you, better than I would me," Howard tells Caroline. Disappointed that money should mean so much to Howard, Caroline breaks their engagement. Another crushing blow falls when Philip tells Caroline and her mother, Alva—a pampered, selfish woman—that they must vacate "Hawthorn," their lovely home, and live in a poor section of the town. Caroline had never attributed strength to her mother, but she expected her to carry through gracefully instead of giving away her emotions as she did. Caroline is doubly disappointed when her father, whom she thought capable of meeting any emergency, accepts defeat. To get away from it all, Caroline goes for a ride in her roadster. She has a flat tire and a shabby looking stranger comes to her assistance. Caroline has no money with her, and when she insists upon driving home with her to get it, she gives him her wrist-watch.

CHAPTER VII

It was heartbreaking—their fortunes piling up so rapidly. Caroline was determined not to feel sorry for herself, and she clung—in spite of what she had said to her mother and father—to a faint hope for a reconciliation with Howard. But the immediate future of her life was bleak enough in prospect even with that. They might be sweethearts, she and Howard, but heaven knew when they could marry.

When Caroline reached her home she was thoroughly discouraged. The reaction following her outburst of independence had set in. She had no idea how she was to make good her boast to her parents that she would earn her own support. As she approached the house she thought that it showed already the hand of adversity laid upon it. Some of the front window blinds were still down, there was no smoke coming from the fireplace chimneys, a piece of paper that had blown there in the night lay on the front steps and a car that should have been at the service—or was standing before the stately entrance.

Caroline drove her roadster up behind it, angered that anyone should dare to flaunt the customs and dignity of her fine old home simply because the Rutledges were penniless. As though money alone were all that constituted the prestige of Hawthorn House.

She entered in haste, meaning to demand instant removal of the alien car in the driveway. A man in a garage mechanic's clothes was in conversation with her mother in the hall. Alva turned to Caroline in evident relief.

Caroline halted, looked at the man before her. He had a pleasant face; his manner was easy but respectful. Caroline knew in an instant that he had intended no affront in using the main gateway to the estate.

She greeted her mother, then. "What is it you wish?" she asked of him before Alva had spoken. It was natural for her to usurp the prerogatives of mistress at Hawthorn House; it's command having been so often that upon her.

"I was just explaining to Mrs. Rutledge here that I was sent for a roadster," he said patiently. "She said you was using it."

"It's in the drive, but..." she hesitated, stopped. The man was looking embarrassed. "How will you drive it?" she asked as naturally as she could force herself to speak.

"How?" he repeated. "There's nothing wrong with it, is there?" "One bad spare," she said, "but you don't drive cars tandem, do you?"

He grinned. "I get you. I've got another fellow with me. He's probably taking a look round at your flowers. Got some of his own."

Alva's lips compressed into a hard line. "Please ask him to take the car away immediately," she said stiffly and turned back into the drawing room.

A few moments later Caroline joined her. There was a tense, set look on the girl's face.

Indignant with the Labatt family for certain promises allegedly made to the kidnap gang. They were prepared to demand that all promises be disregarded and that all information which might lead to the apprehension of the abductors be given to police.

"Both John and Hugh (who had the ransom money ready) are at home now," a friend of the family said.

The wealthy brewer, seized from his automobile near London on Tuesday, was released by his abductors some time during the night and appeared first at the Royal York hotel in Toronto.

Dishevelled and needing a shave, he staggered into the hotel lobby leaning on the arm of another man. He was wrapped in a robe. His face was drawn and pale. His heart was known to be weak and his appearance was that of a man who had suffered severe shock.

"Where is my brother, Hugh?" asked John Labatt, he told the started night clerk.

Hotel detectives quickly led him to the basement to escape crowds and thence to a room, from which he was later taken secretly to Hugh's home here.

Reunited with his wife and three children, John Labatt was placed under care of a doctor of Hugh's home and strict orders against disclosure of information were given by dominant police officials. For the next few hours, mystery concerning his abduction was slow in lifting.

Indianapolis Truck Driver Is Hi-Jacked

(Indianapolis, Ind., Aug. 17.—(UP)—State police said today they were without clues to hi-jackers who kidnaped Voyle E. Seeright, Indianapolis truck driver, at Elizabethtown, Ky., early yesterday, drove him back near Indianapolis, and stole his cargo of 393 automobile batteries.

Seeright reported the theft after he had freed himself from bonds which held him in the rear of the truck.

used successfully for a number of years and anyone interested should consult county agent L. E. Arch-her mother breathed a sigh of relief. Years before Alva Rutledge had decided that illusions were worthwhile only so long as they remained intact. Broken, they were like pieces of china, to be discarded. She had forgotten what they meant to youth. Her point of view was a worldly one. She believed in charm and femininity but had no faith in false idealism. Caroline, she decided, was being childish about Howard. And the girl's soiled costume had been troubling her all through their conversation.

"Run up and change," she said, seeming to dismiss the subject of lovers' quarrels.

When Caroline had disappeared Alva hurried to a telephone, the first gleam of hope in her eyes that had been there that day.

The Dunsworth butler answered Alva's telephone call, but it was not Howard Dunsworth to whom he carried her message when she asked to speak to that young man.

"Oh my dear Alva," it was his mother's voice she heard drawing smoothly over the wire. "Howard has left us for a little trip to California. He's flying out. The poor boy was dreadfully broken up over everything, but I told him Caroline was perfectly right to end their engagement. Their prospects, you know," she added vaguely, "with Henry so unrelenting where he feels he has not been... well... shall we say—quite fairly treated?" The silky voice came sweetly to a close on a gentle sigh.

Alva Rutledge was far too experienced in worldly contacts to have called the Dunsworth home without being prepared to talk with her arch enemy, Alethea Dunsworth. And she had known that Alethea would be unpleasant. So she said in a tone as soft as Alethea's own: "The poor darling, but Caroline is really a very sensible child. She saw quite readily that she could no longer think of marrying a young man who is so utterly dependent upon his father for everything as dear Howard is. But of course it isn't easy for her, and that's why I called, to make certain that Howard would not see her again. It's a great relief to learn that he has gone away. Thank you very much." Quickly she put back the instrument, cutting off an anticipated remark from Alethea concerning the Rutledge financial misfortune.

It was a small triumph, one that did not prevent her spirits from sinking to a new low depth. She faced with consternation the fact that Caroline's future was definitely a problem with no solution in view. "If only she were not so obstinately in love with Howard," she thought irritably, her mind on other young men who had found her daughter attractive.

MR. TIMOTHY HAY: Yes, I've seen a few bad crop years in my time, too. One year our string beans were so poor that the crop didn't pay for the string.

MR. AL FALFA: That's nothing, Tim. In '94 our corn crop was so bad that my old dad, who had a very poor appetite, ate up 14 acres of corn at a single meal.

MR. LOCAL FARMER: Do you suppose it would pay you to feed some of Stuckey's Hog-Glad to your boarding hogs, when you can buy same with an absolute guarantee to show results or your money refunded?
