CAROLINE by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

CHAPTER XIX
The next morning Caroline hastily swallowed a cup of coffee before Mrs. Rutledge arrived and was out of the house long before her parents were up. When she returned they were at breakfast. She greeted them breathlessly. Mrs. Rutledge stared disapprovingly at her costume.
"Congratulations me," she invited. "I've obtained a position!"
Her mother lifted inquiring eyebrows. Her father looked pleased. "Old clothes, an assumed name and evidence of a willing spirit did it," Caroline explained.
"An assumed name?" her mother echoed. "Is it something you're ashamed of?"
"Not at all. I had to fool Henry Dunsworth—in case he ever hears the names of his employees."
"Henry Dunsworth?" her father ejaculated. "You don't mean..."
"No breadline for me," Caroline broke in. "There's a new order of things. I belong to it. It's my day. I'm going to start at the bottom as William Rutledge did and make myself valuable to society. If technology or anything like it comes along and tells me when and how to work—okay—but I'm not going to starve in the meantime."
Full comprehension came to her mother. "A factory worker!" she wailed. Mr. Rutledge was torn between indignation and a new respect for his daughter.
"A factory worker," Caroline repeated with pride. "The only thing I needed to make me a person of equal rights in this world. I am now the sociological ideal—an educated, healthy worker. I hope I shall learn to work as successfully as I learned to play. I got the job half an hour ago and I'm beginning already to feel the satisfaction of earned leisure. Think of what an evening of idleness will be like after a day of labor!"
"But where will it get you—this sort of thing?" her father pressed. "You won't make enough money to fill your leisure with the kind of play you learned to enjoy."
"I think," Caroline said stoutly, "no matter what's coming, there will always be a premium on brains. I'm going to develop mine. They're good brains—you know that. You and the men and women who passed you your genes have given me a good start. I'm going back to the U to study at night. I'm going to learn about chemistry, and some day I'll know how to run the factory."
This was too much for Mrs. Rutledge. The next quarter hour was taken up with bringing her out of a heart attack. Her daughter in a factory! She couldn't bear it! But she did, for Caroline would not give it up.
The factory work, because she saw each day given to it as a step upward to greater achievement, was thrilling to her. It irked her only in that it was confining. Her father one night, in an ill-humor, questioned her ultimate success. She argued that she was successful, that she wanted greater achievement only in order to pay the world back what it had given her.
"Where do you get such ideas?" her mother asked fretfully.
"From the young man next door," Mr. Rutledge supplied smugly. "I imagine he expounds them in order to give an illusion of importance to his very humble position in society."
Caroline's eyes darkened. "When you talk like that, father," she said musingly, "I'm inclined to think you're afraid of those at the bottom of the heap."
"What nonsense are you talking now?"
"It isn't nonsense," Caroline differed. "It's the handwriting on the wall. If you can't see it, that will be your misfortune. You can't just stand still, and keep up with the world."
"Are you being impertinent?" Mr. Rutledge said severely.
"I don't mean to be, but you are rude when you speak as you did about one of my friends. I think I owe more to Malcolm than to anyone else in the world. Without him it's very probable I couldn't have

"If you catch on above Malcolm then you can talk about his humble position; until you do, you're not up to his level!"

I'd tried, before that, but I thought I could be a bit particular. And that's what you're doing—waiting for something you want. You don't seem to realize that you've lost the position you inherited and that you'll have to start wherever you can get a foothold to climb up again. If you catch on above Malcolm, then you can talk about his humble position; until you do, you're not up to his level!"
Philip Rutledge gasped, his face reddened, and he appeared on the verge of losing his self-control, but under Caroline's coolly defiant gaze he slowly calmed down.
"I certainly can't go to Henry Dunsworth for a position, if that is what you are thinking of," he snapped.
"No. And I'm aware that jobs are not to be had for the asking. But you could give up the notion that labor with your hands is a shameful thing and help me get a garden laid out in the backyard. You could put in walks and build a lily pool and a rock garden. Malcolm has loads of plants and bulbs we can put in this fall. And you have only to go down to the river for all the rocks you require. I won't need the car any more. Malcolm's putting an extra seat on his motorcycle to take me to work."
Mrs. Rutledge was stunned, but Philip answered explosively: "It's disgraceful! I forbid you to do such an unseemly thing!"
Caroline smiled. "Please don't resort to ridiculous gestures, father," she said quietly. "I haven't told you everything. Malcolm and I have another reason for needing a means of transportation of our own."
