CAROLINE by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

CHAPTER XXIII

In the Stuart home there was grave concern for Caroline. "They don't eat right, I know they don't," Mrs. Stuart declared in futile protest to Malcolm. "That poor woman will never be a housekeeper. It just isn't in her and I guess she can't help it, the poor thing."

"I guess you're right, Ma," Malcolm returned in a troubled voice. "I've noticed that Caroline's lunches are pretty skimpy."

"I'll put them up for her," he shook his head. "She wouldn't stand for it. But you can slip an extra goody for her into mine. Something kind of dainty. I'll say you've gone flaky on me and I don't want to hurt your feelings by telling you I can't eat the stuff."

Scheming in this way they afforded Caroline the only food she got that tempted her appetite. She had tried whenever she had a moment to spare to stir some housewifely pride in her mother's bosom, but Alva hated it. Caroline bought books on food and diet for her. Alva said they bored her, and continued to feed her family badly.

Caroline was a pale wraith of a girl by the end of August. She was learning what she could at the university, but there was no satisfaction in doing either.

She had, in sheer need of finding new interests, attempted to form a social club among the workers she had met. But the girls shied away from her. They did not dislike her, but she was not popular. Because of her difference she was strange to them. They felt self-conscious, awkward, in her presence. They knew nothing about her and it seemed queer to them that a girl could be so close-mouthed about herself. They shared their confidences, sometimes openly, talked freely of their boy friends, their "makes," their rows, their hard luck, their good times, their parents' "bustin' in," their illnesses, anything and everything that directly concerned their lives.

Some among them tried to pump Malcolm, but he would answer them with such a ridiculous story—always different—that finally they were discouraged in their curious quest. They grew used to Caroline, ceased to wonder about her and she was left to her silence, her work, and Malcolm.

Caroline was feeling one evening when she came home that she had a friend in the world aside from him. Neither, it seemed, had her mother or father. It caught her by surprise to see when she opened the front door, that they had company.

The caller was a woman who had never before been inside Alva's house. She was one of those whom Mrs. Rutledge had refused to see. But the woman was not thinking now of how Mrs. Wade had turned her back at the door with the information that "the madam was laying down and didn't want to be bothered."

It was Alva who opened the door to her today, and invited her in. The woman had asked if she might use the telephone—not if there was one in the house, Alva had noted, and promised that her neighbors knew more of her house and its contents than she did of theirs.

She had hesitated, uncertain whether this might be setting a precedent she should not care to have established. "I'm Mrs. Barnes," the woman had said. "We haven't got a phone, Mrs. Rutledge, and I want to call Dr. Shultz. My little girl's sick and I don't know what's the matter with her."

Alva had shown her to the telephone and when the mother had put in the call she asked about the sick child. "She's got a fever, I'm afraid," Mrs. Barnes said, "she's been getting hotter all day and her head aches. I thought she was just tired from over-doing maybe on that camping trip. She's been away for a few weeks, up at Clayford Forks. Ever since she's been home she hasn't seemed to feel like lifting her hand."

Alva remembered something she had read in the news. A report of an outbreak of typhoid in a workmen's camp near Clayford Forks where a bridge was under construction. The men had been drinking spring water, which the health authorities claimed was polluted. The heavy rains which had followed the prolonged dry spell had washed contaminated soil into the spring, they said, and warned the public against drinking from unprotected springs or streams.

Alva knew nothing of the symptoms of typhoid except that one of the earliest is lassitude, and she feared to alarm the mother by speaking of what she had read, but the thought of a typhoid epidemic in South Town was appalling. It was, she knew, a disease requiring stricter supervision of sanitary conquerade, and try to find a position you needn't be ashamed of?" Caroline answered with patient weariness. "I'm not ashamed, and it would take more energy to look for a new job than it does to do my work at the factory."

"Well, then, give up studying at night. It's ruining your health. And it's getting you nowhere."

Caroline shrugged. "Perhaps not, but it's something to do." "Look here," her father broke in, "you boasted to me once that your friends weren't all social registers. Can't you find some among them who would stoop to Edge Street for old time's sake? It would give you something to do to have a few people around."

The steady, knowing, stare with ditions than was likely to develop in the community. She decided to appeal to Dr. Shultz for his diagnosis of the child's illness.

The doctor would be there in half an hour, Mrs. Barnes said, preparing to leave. "I'll have to be going and get some fresh sheets ironed," she smiled apologetically. "Had them all in the wash today, except those on the beds, of course, and Lillie's look terrible—she's been cold, fretful, tossing and turning."

"Oh do let me save you that trouble," Alva urged. "I have an extra supply."

She went upstairs to get the linen. Mrs. Barnes waited. Caroline arrived just as her mother came down. Introductions were short and Caroline did not learn until their neighbor was gone why her mother was giving her an armful of linen.

"It's typhoid I'm afraid," Alva said. "I'm going to telephone Dr. Shultz later. If it is typhoid we have a right to know it."

Philip came in, and heard the story. "You're jumping to conclusions," he said crossly. "Let's worry about our own affairs."

"You mean the empty case in the cellar, I suppose," Alva retorted. "Well, you can't deny that an appetizer improves a poor dinner," he answered.

Caroline left them. Their growing tendency to bicker with each other was something she could not endure. Presently her mother called to her up the stairs and she came down, dressed in one of the simple frocks she wore to the university.

Alva watched her as she toyed with a bit of overdone steak. "You're too thin, Caroline," she said accusingly. "Why don't you give up this . . . this ridiculous mas-which Caroline regarded him caused him a measure of uneasiness. He understood her silent protest that parties cost money, and they had none for that purpose.

"Don't you see any of your former friends at the university?" her mother asked.

"I avoid them," Caroline said bluntly.

"Well," Alva sighed, and turned to other matters. "I wish you would run down to the store and get some ice cream for dessert."

"What—more of that cornstarch mess!" Mr. Rutledge exclaimed.

"You may have melon if you like," Alva said icily. But there was no melon, she discovered, and remembered that she had forgotten to put it on her shopping list.

Caroline walked to the store. It was on the next street, not far. On her way she passed the Barnes's house and stopped to inquire about their little girl. She knew the child slightly, a small, elfish creature with long black curls and big blue eyes, skipping her rope up and down the street early and late. Caroline had lifted her in the hot weather for the discomfort the heavy hair must cause her.

A woman Caroline did not know answered her ring. When the door was opened she could hear Mrs. Barnes crying as she talked with someone in the living room. Caroline was not going in but Mrs. Barnes called to her when she heard her voice.

"The doctor's afraid it's fever—typhoid," the woman who admitted her explained to Caroline. "He said something about a . . . a serum reaction . . . whatever that is."
