agreed upon for the operations was in the neighborhood of $7,500. When the physicians received less than one-half of this sum they were angry and willing to talk.

Federal agents admitted today they had confessions from both doctors and from Arthur W. O'Leary, an employee of Piquett. It was learned, too, that they had a confession from Marie Conforti, sweetheart of the slain VanMeter.

With this evidence behind them the government planned to place its case before the grand jury late today seeking indictments charging Piquett, alleged "master mind" of the Dillinger gang, the two ## physicians, O'Leary, Marie Conforti, and Mr. and Mrs. William Finerty with conspiracy to harbor Dillinger.

The capture of Marie Conforti leaves only one of the many women followers of the Dillinger gang still at large. She is the wife of George (Baby Face) Nelson, number one desperado since Dillinger was slain by federal agents. Presumably she travels with her husband who is the subject of an intense search by government agents and state and local authorities.

Although Nelson is the leader of the remnants of the Dillinger gang, agents expressed the view today that there are others with him. These may even include John Hamilton, one source disclosed, although federal agents in St. Paul at the time of VanMeter's death said they were sure Hamilton is dead.

CAROLINE by RUTH DEWEY GROVES

CHAPTER XXIV

Caroline started to express sympathy to Mrs. Barnes, but was interrupted by the woman whose name she did not know. "I'll have to run, Sarah," the woman said, "my folks ain't had their supper yet."

Mrs. Barnes nodded and she departed. "My Jim hasn't got home," Mrs. Barnes said to Caroline. "I hate to tell him about Lillie—he worships her so, and this is no time for him to be worried, out of work and all."

"How is Lillie?" Caroline asked. "She's pretty sick, but we can't tell yet. I wish I could get the medicine the doctor ordered, but I'll have to wait for Jim. Mrs. Grobel here hasn't got a car in her family either. She's too far to walk to a drug store. And the doctor said to get it as soon as I could."

"Give me the prescription," Caroline said. "I'll get it for you when I've been to Blake's for mother." When she was gone Mrs. Grobel said: "You might have introduced me more properly like Sarah, but never mind. I'll bet they're having ice cream again. I never heard tell of such extravagance."

Caroline hurried. But before she reached home her father had gone off with the car. "I'll have to ask Malcolm to take me on his motorcycle," she said to her mother, and was gone in a flash.

The ice cream melted in the car.

Malcolm was just finishing a generous portion of peach cobbler when she entered the Stuarts' dining room. He too was dressed in clothes he wore to the U. "I'm afraid we'll be late tonight," Caroline said, and told him what she wanted. He said: "I feel like playing hooky today. Let's go to a movie."

But they did not go to a movie. At the drug store they waited half an hour while the prescription was made up. A half hour in which trouble continued to stalk the Barnes household. When they arrived there they found a small crowd gathered before the house. The air was charged with the horror of a serious accident.

Caroline went in at once. Malcolm remained outside. Some one told him that Jim Barnes had just been brought home badly hurt. He'd been getting off a street car and was hit by an automobile. No, he didn't seem to be dying, but one of his legs was smashed, Malcolm's informant guessed.

Malcolm was spared hearing further gruesome details. Caroline came hurrying out to him, white and trembling. "You've heard?" she said. "Oh, how terrible!"

He led her down the walk to his motorcycle. "Let's go and get Mom," he said steadily.

"They just brought him in," Caroline choked. "I'm to telephone Dr. Schultz. If I can't get him I'm going to call an ambulance. No one in there seemed to know what to do."

"I know," Malcolm said. "Can you go alone?" The thought in his mind was that Barnes might need a tourniquet on his injured leg. He pushed his way into the house, and found someone holding a glass of water to the groaning man's lips. Malcolm caught it. "He may be hurt internally," he said shortly. "don't give him anything to drink."

He examined the leg and found that it was bleeding profusely. No one else in the room knew how to apply a tourniquet, but Malcolm succeeded in getting the things he wanted. It was crude work, but Dr. Schultz said when he arrived shortly that it was effective. He had, he added, summoned an ambulance.

Another physician also arrived, one sent by the traction company upon receiving the report of the car conductor. He examined the patient and approved his immediate transfer to a hospital.

The clanger and rush accompanying the ambulance brought further excitement to the block, but when

Jim Barnes had been taken away in it and those in command in the house had cleared it of people who could not be of use Mrs. Stuart was found to be the one who was giving orders.

She had sent Malcolm away too and he went to see that Caroline was all right. The girl was trying to quiet her mother's upset nerves. Malcolm did not go in.

"Why, in heaven's name, if you must have an admirer," Alva said snappishly, "don't you choose someone of your own station in life? It really goes beyond good taste, this association of yours with that young man."

Caroline turned away without answering. She was too tired to argue all over again that Malcolm was of her station in life as she saw it. Money did not count now—only character. Malcolm had that. Family? If character came from family then Malcolm's forbears must have been as fine as hers. Not so fortunate, perhaps, but that, she believed, was the only difference.

She went out and sat on the front steps. Moonflowers that she and Malcolm had planted were opening big pale blooms in the soft darkness. Her navy blue dress made her indistinguishable, but she could see the tip of a cigarette glowing on the Stuart steps. A warm feeling of appreciation, of faith, came over her as she thought of Malcolm there, thinking, perhaps, of her. She knew it was a selfish feeling,—to be glad of his devotion when she had nothing to give in return—but it was too healing to her injured pride and hopelessness to be rejected.

After a while she saw someone in a light dress go up from the street and sit down beside Malcolm. A match flared. Caroline saw the newcomer's face clearly enough to recognize it, and the recognition brought her a shock.

Caroline had heard something of Cecilia Cadden, the girl who sat beside Malcolm, from his mother. Mrs. Stuart was not given to gossiping freely but she disliked Cecilia intensely. Caroline had smiled at her reasons, but now she felt vaguely disturbed in the same way. Cecilia, whose beautiful name had been corrupted to Sissy, was a "go-getter," a "man-eater," and she had openly cast her bright blue eyes on Malcolm.

Caroline got up and went into the house. What happened to Malcolm was, of course, his own affair, but it would be disappointing to discover in him any response to the wishes of a girl like Cecilia.

The last thing before she fell asleep she sensibly assured herself that Malcolm couldn't have got up and left the girl there whether her presence was welcome or not. But still her mind remained unwarrantably accusing.

The next morning she hadn't forgotten it either. Cecilia simply wasn't worthy of his attention. Anyone interested in him would tell him that. She would, if he gave her an opening. But he didn't, for he had already forgotten Cecilia. The girl had known that his mother was attending Mrs. Barnes and the sick child, had seen him smoking on the steps and seized the opportunity to talk with him. But she had got nowhere and soon had drifted on to some other field in search of conquest.

Caroline asked about his mother, what had happened at the Barnes's, how the child was. His mother, Malcolm said, had spent most of the night there. Another neighbor had relieved her at three o'clock. Before that he himself had gone to the hospital. Mr. Barnes's condition was as well as might be expected, he'd been told. He said nothing about Cecilia.

"What in the world will that poor woman do?" Caroline exclaimed.

"Charity will have to take care of them. Mom says they're flat. Mrs. Barnes is prostrated."

That evening Caroline called at the Barnes's. Her arms were filled with flowers. But at the end of the hour she spent in the house she had made a mental list of more useful things to bring.

Her mother argued that she had more than enough to do without concerning herself with that afflicted household. "A visiting nurse was there today," Mrs. Rutledge told her. Dr. Schultz will see that they get proper medical attention. And the neighbors are helping. You aren't needed. It's very foolish of you to risk your own health."

Caroline knew that she was allowing her kindly impulses to lead her into danger. She should, in all common sense, leave the assistance of the family to those better qualified to help than she. But she knew, too, that the visiting nurses were not staying night and day, and the neighbors were women with heavy burdens of their own. Besides, it had quickly become apparent that the experience she had gained at the Junior League's day nursery was broader than she had realized. Lillie seemed to find her ministrations soothing. And in that fact Caroline found balm for the feeling of inferiority that persistently crept into her morale.

As the child's temperature mounted, showing each day a higher point, the doctor ordered cool wet wrappings for the burning body. Someone was needed in constant attendance at the bedside.

Caroline gave up her studies at the U and spent the time with Lillie. Sight of the poor little blotched body brought a sob to her throat, when she lifted away the towels that so soon became heated and replaced them with others wrung from cool fresh water.

For a moment the restless head would lie still, the thin arms relax on one of the many fine linen sheets from the Rutledge supply, then the tossing and agony would begin anew.

It was Caroline who convinced Mrs. Barnes that the child's curls must be shorn as the doctor said. It was Caroline who kept ice in the house, who brought extra pillows so that they might be constantly changed and cooled, who bought the rubber sheet for the child to lie on, who brought rubber-soled shoes for those who shared in the nursing, who paid for medical supplies from her own meagre wages.

Delirium came in the third week and then Caroline, who was beginning to feel languid and uneasy, could not desert. Lillie called for her constantly with the frantic, unceasing, appeal of a sufferer who wants only relief from physical torment. Mrs. Barnes was hurt that in so short a time Caroline's ability to ease her pain had become so fixed in the child's mind that in unconsciousness it replaced filial yearnings. But she was too grateful to Caroline to show how she felt about that. And there was more need of the girl's help now than before. For as Mrs. Rutledge had feared, the typhoid had broken out in other homes, threatened to reach epidemic proportions in South Town.

She was frantic with worry over Caroline, and time proved her fears justified. Caroline dragged along, more or less an "ambulatory case," before loss of strength finally drove her to bed.

She became so ill that her life was despaired of. The doctor said bluntly that she had no reserve of vitality and only expert medical attention and skilled nursing could save her. There were other cases in the block; the street there was closed to general traffic, the clocks in the Rutledge house were muffled, the telephone bell was wrapped in cotton, the doorbells were silenced and carpet was laid on the outside steps. The door latches were padded with felt and every hinge about the place was oiled. The house was almost as silent as a tomb. Those within it spoke in whispers, and yet at intervals some sound, vastly magnified by the girl's sharpened hearing, brought the flicker of nervous shock over her prostrate body.

YOUR HOUSEHOLD REFRIGERATOR

Did you ever think that your ice box or mechanical refrigerator holds the family health in its cold insides? Do you know why foods spoil, how they deteriorate, and what your refrigerator does to them to keep them fresh and healthful? Refrigeration is really the only method which affords a means of preserving food in its raw state for reasonably long periods. There are a lot of useful things you should know and can quickly learn about household refrigeration. Our Washington Bureau has ready for you one of its authoritative and simply written, understandable, bulletins
